THERE are so many fine qualities about "The Cup of Life" that it deserves high praise. Within the whole body of the work is visible the common ideal toward which all high-class producers are progressing, an ideal that really emerges from the united efforts of many minds. The play is a relief in one respect. It is a reaction against theatricalism and more than that—it is a motion-picture drama pure and simple, untrammelled by stage traditions and practices. Unlike the stage presentation, that of the screen is close to life, to contemporary life in theme. It is not built upon French designs, but concerns what is going on now and here.

The main story is that of a proud and beautiful young girl in humble circumstances. She and her commonplace sister work in a store for small wages and live in an East Side tenement. The simpler and plainer sister has a "regular fellow" and becomes engaged to him. He brings along a chum, a primitive young tough of the dirty-fingered type, and tries to make it a party of four, but the whole environment is so revolting to the high-spirited girl that it turns her sick. Across the narrow court from her window she can see a haggard mother slaving over the tub to keep her poorly nourished brood alive. On the fire escape are huddled haggard children, stifling in their efforts to breathe. She is overwhelmed by the prospect of marriage in such a station, but she dashes herself against the restraints of environment in vain until the back door to a life of beauty is offered to her.

Man is the tempter. That seems to be his social role. No one blames him for selecting beautiful girls and making the perpetuation of their beauty a social impossibility by an unsanctioned relation. There may be an evolutionary reason behind it all—women of great beauty and light principle may not be worth perpetuating—but this destruction is constantly going on. It is an every day factor of present existence. The beautiful girl has all the desires of her heart satisfied but one—the love she receives, like the love she gives, is a shallow pretense. In truth her egotism is so constantly fostered in a gay life about town that she loses all realization of her debt to society.

In well-adjusted contrast to her career is shown that of the plain sister. She marries the mechanic, to whom her simple heart goes out in natural selection, and they pass through a bitter struggle together. Existence for them is little more than a series of hardships, but they are shoulder to shoulder, comrades in the battle, sustained by the world's dominating force, unselfish love. Their lives are delightfully consistent to the end of the play, their growth being modest enough, and this consistency is boldly shown in the beautiful girl's career. The whole production, logical, consistent, appealing in its settings of contrasted loveliness and ugliness, admirably typed, is deeply human and profoundly impressive.

THE NEW EXPLOITS OF ELAINE, EPISODE 3.

In Which the Curtain Is Brought Down on Kennedy and Jamieson in Possession of Bennett's Millions.

Reviewed by Margaret I. MacDonald.

THE third episode ends happily but for one thing; the millions of the dead lawyer have been found, but Elaine is still missing, which sad fact throws a pall over the circumstance, leaving Kennedy and Jamieson grave in the midst of what would otherwise have been a glorious triumph.

Scene from "The Exploits of Elaine" (Pathe).

The cryptic ring has been found to be the key which opens the mysterious lock in the wall of the tunnel, allowing the shelf upon which the box containing the millions in jewels, etc., is placed, to reveal itself. This has been accomplished because Craig Kennedy has made a duplicate of the ring; the original placed in the keeping of Elaine's mother is afterwards stolen. There has been an unconscious race for the tunnel, the Chinaman, Wu Fang, having become again possessor, has been the first to discover the whereabouts of the box, but upon hearing sounds from without, he has decided to leave it for another time and makes tracks just in time to avoid a bullet from Kennedy's revolver.

It remains to be seen what will be the price asked for the safe return of Elaine. The bridging of this situation promises to open new avenues for thrilling events.

The series grows more interesting as it progresses, and it must be acceded that the combined Wharton forces are making a tremendous success of the big Pathe-Hearst serial.

"The Sign of the Rose."

George Beban Scores a Remarkable Hit in Kessel & Baumann's Novel Production.

Reviewed by George Blaisdell.

Los Angeles, April 13.

AS George Beban walked from the stage of Clune's Auditorium last night a great audience applauded long and heartily. In "The Sign of the Rose" the famous Italian character actor had scored a triumph. Both on the screen and on the stage his work in the unique dramatic combination had stirred and melted the vast house. It was not a story of the powerful or of the rich. The whole tale turned on a stooped, unkempt ditch-digger—of the same type as we in New York see by the hundreds and thousands—and it turned also on a little girl, Rosa, the motherless daughter of Pietro. It was the touch of nature, the many touches of nature, that swayed and held the three thousand men and women who followed the pathetic figure—in his supreme happiness in the companionship of the child in his unspeakable grief over her tragic death.

As a vaudeville piece Mr. Beban had played "The Sign of the Rose" for five years, two of these abroad. The present combination of nearly nine thousand feet of pictures and a half hour of spoken drama is the result of three years' thought and planning. With the denouement portrayed on the screen instead of on the stage the subject will be a great photoplay. One of the local critics stated he would so prefer it. The story in the picturized form does not run very far before one is impressed with the craftsmanlike character of the structure. We are now referring to the scenario side. Thomas H. Ince has given his personal attention to the whole production; the hand of a master is evident throughout. There are the staging of the restaurant scenes and of the homelike interiors of the Griswold mansion, the creation of the Santa Claus atmosphere, and the skillful handling of the accident that takes Rosa from Pietro and the scenes that follow close upon it as the neighbors—fine types—crowd in and afterward try to mob Griswold.

Blanche Schwed splendidly portrays Rosa. Thelma Salter is Dorothy, daughter of the Griswolds. It is little Dorothy who is kidnapped by her uncle; the detectives try to place the blame on Pietro. Jack Davidson as Robbins, the friend, accommodating manager of the flower shop, displays marked strength in his portrayal. Jack Nelson does well in the role of Phil Griswold, the black sheep. Hayward Ginn is good as William Griswold. In commenting on "The Sign of the Rose" it would be a major omission to fail to mention the photography. It was of the best.

Manager Lloyd Brown had so built his stage that when the 26½-foot screen was raised on the flower shop scene the whole setting was in the identical position its counterpart had occupied in the picture. The augmented orchestra, under Carli D. Elinor, contributed much to the success of the evening's entertainment.

It is possible Mr. Beban has instituted something which may have a marked influence on the stage. His work is bound to have imitators. Those who match him in selection of appealing story and also in art of interpretation on both sides of the dramatic fence will be not many. The possibilities of the idea seemingly are limitless. Introducing our greatest actors we may have a part of the play produced on the screen, making full use of great natural backgrounds and luxurious and spacious interiors, with the latter part interpreted through the magic of the human voice.

Comments of the Local Press.

The following extracts are taken from the criticisms of "The Sign of the Rose" appearing in the three morning papers of Los Angeles:

Examiner.—It would seem that this photoplay will be one of the most striking of the season.

Times.—To me Beban is one of the great artists of America. I think, perhaps he goes deeper into our feelings than any man on the American stage. * * * As far as I am concerned the combination is not good art. Either would be excellent alone.

Tribune.—To discover anything in a film attraction that would not be in the nature of an anti-climax to "The Clansman" seemed an impossibility, yet that sensational spectacle is followed by an attraction that promises to have as strong an appeal, by reason of its beauty and novelty of a different sort, as the Griffith film. The joining of the two arts is adroitly done, and the setting in all the beautiful hues of the florist's stock makes a striking appeal to the imagination. * * * Perhaps it is not too much to say that no actor ever had the aid of such photographic realism and color as framework for his movements.

Two Interesting Edison Releases.

"Her Proper Place," Three Reels, and "Their Own Ways," One Reel.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

MIRIAM NESBITT, in the role of a self-sacrificing elder sister, presents an interesting character study and easily dominates all other personalities in "Her Proper Place." This very significant title points the trend of her story during the earlier scenes and takes on new meaning in the end. The elder sister is a charming woman, so delightful that the first reel, given up almost entirely to characterization, holds attention without resort to tricks of suspense. She is a home girl, capable of attending to woman's supposed sphere, even preparing a meal for the entire family during the defection of a servant and without detriment to her social charm while entertaining company in the parlor.

This strong and sensible girl cherishes a secret adoration for a bachelor Senator impersonated by Marc MacDermott, and there is a wondrous depth of sincerity in her natural choice. She eventually strikes out for herself, leaves home, and passes through a trying experience as a working girl, earning her own living. In this capacity she comes into contact with the handsome Senator and saves his life when he is attacked by grafting gamblers. She escapes without revealing her identity, returns home and he is unable to trace his benefactor for some time after.

In a moment of folly, she commits an act all out of keeping with her general character. Stung by the marriage and engagement of younger members of the family, she announces that she, too, is engaged, and she is not particularly clever in her deception. It becomes noised abroad that the handsome Senator is engaged to her, and he disclaims having any acquaintance with her until he goes to her house to investigate. There he recognizes the long-sought girl who saved his life and he saves her embarrassing situation by becoming engaged in dead earnest.

In different vein is another high comedy entitled "Their Own Ways" admirably handled by Charles M. Seay. It relates to the false view of what constitutes happiness. An old couple in their own home are discovered doing the chores when their daughter and her husband run out in their car for a week's end. The younger people insist upon the older ones returning the visit with a view to enjoying life, and they comply. Accustomed to work all their lives, until it has become a part of their wholesome daily routine, the elderly folks feel out of place in the city and show it in some delicious comedy characterization.

They enjoy the company, but not the customs that enforce inactivity under the misleading title of leisure. Leisure to them is a bore. To sit around and discuss inanities affords them no pleasure. They dream of the horses, the cows, the chicks and all that enlivens creative farm live and run away like a couple of naughty old children. There is a sweet naturalness in this little story, a delightful lack of affectation, that will endear it to spectators wherever it is shown.

Miss Vera de Cordova, who made a marked impression in Richard Bennett's production of "Maternity," at the Princess Theater, has gone to Jamaica to play the leading parts in the picture plays Mr. Tom Terriss is producing there.

"The Lady of the Lighthouse"

The Education of the Blind Is Sympathetically Depicted in Three-Part Vitagraph Picture.

Reviewed by Lynde Denig.

AMONG pictures with a purpose deeper than that of passing entertainment, this three-part Vitagraph production, written by Helen S. Woodruff and produced by Captain Harry Lambert, deserves consideration. It would hardly be fair to call it a drama, there is not enough story for that; rather it is a distinctly interesting depiction of the treatment accorded the blind in a New York institution. "The Lady of the Lighthouse" is a poetic and possibly misleading title that might well be supplemented by a more explanatory sub-title, for one never would guess the true occupation of the lady in question. She is deeply concerned in the welfare of the inmates of an institution for the blind, and because of her activity on their behalf, her desire to carry light into lives doomed to darkness, she comes to be called "The Lady of the Lighthouse."

Helen S. Woodruff writing "The Lady of the Lighthouse."

The film is supplied with a slight story through the introduction of a fine, manly little fellow, whose sight is destroyed by the premature explosion of a firecracker. Marion Hope, the lady of the poetic title, persuades Victor's father that the boy should be sent to the school where he may learn the language of the blind and master an occupation despite his handicap. In well photographed scenes, we see the remarkable facility of girls and boys, and men and women who have been taught useful trades. It is significant that few of the faces in the picture are clouded by the hopeless expression so often seen among those condemned to perpetual night. Their minds are occupied and knowledge lends a touch of brightness to their lives. Scenes in the institution will give many people a new and inspiring idea of the wonderful work being accomplished.

Scene from "The Lady of the Lighthouse" (Vitagraph).

The Vitagraph Company was particularly fortunate in the selection of Reginald Sheffield for the role of the little boy who loses his sight. His striking appearance wins an audience immediately and his acting, unaffected and varied, is unusual in one so young. His semblance of blindness is genuine. It would never do for such a likable little chap to remain blind at the end of the story, so the author provided a convenient, and in photoplays, a popular operation, that restores his sight. Conventional roles are adequately presented by Rose Tapley, Lionel Adams and Charles Wellesley. Mandy Wilson supplies a good character bit as the old negro servant.

"The Spender"

Empress Two-Reel Production Which Speaks Strongly on the Drink Question.

Reviewed by Margaret I. MacDonald.

A VIVID portrayal of characters has been made by Joseph Levering from Rev. C. J. Harris's scenario in the two-reel production entitled "The Spender." The story presents the usually less favored side of the saloon question, and draws a line of distinction between the saloon and the home wine cabinet that is not complimentary to the latter.

"The Spender" is the sort of character that we all love. He is a man who has a smile and a good word for all, who spends his money lavishly, and is the friend of the dumb creation as well as of the human kind. It is indicated, however, that he is the owner of a brewery, and for this reason he is ostracized by the heads of the church.

An event takes place during the course of the story that changes conditions, and the man with the effulgence of good qualities decides to try a business more in keeping with his general character. This event is unpleasant while it lasts. The son of the old minister, lured by the contents of the wine cabinet in the home of one of the deacons of the church, to which he has been introduced by the deacon's son, comes home to his parents in a pitiable condition. Later because he divulges the secret of where the blame lies, he is beaten by some hirlings of the deacon's son, and in his unconscious state is gorged with liquor, and left in the hallway of the deacon's home with bottles in his pockets, and every evidence that he has broken into the house and robbed the cabinet. An effective scene in the magistrate's office settles the question as it should be settled, and the picture closes with the engagement of the daughter of the spender (Marian Swayne) and the minister's son (Joseph Levering).

The picture has been well cast and has been handled with discrimination. It is an entertaining offering as well as being of moral use. J. Sullivan is seen to fine advantage as the Scene from "The Spender" (United).

"Spender" and James Levering is convincing as the old minister. It may also be noted that the task of directing the picture as well as playing one of its principal roles has not fallen heavily on Joseph Levering. Another to whom special mention is due is he who impersonated the deacon, which is one of the best impersonations in the picture.

Jeff De Angelis Is Rejuvenated by His Camera Work.

Jeff de Angelis believes that the pictures are rejuvenating him. In the forthcoming World Comedy-Star release, "Beware the Dog," by Mark Swan, he will appear in nearly every acrobatic caper imaginable. He turns a double somersault over the back of a chair, falls downstairs alighting at the bottom in a most undignified manner on the crown of his head, falls into a tub filled with chilly water, and lastly, to cap the climax, allows a score of dogs to chase him to a telegraph pole, up which he clambers in a surprisingly youthful manner. The comedian says, however, that he feels rather lame, but he doesn't credit that to old age but lack of training.

Mason Hopper Joins World Comedy Stars.

E. Mason Hopper, is a new director for World Comedy Stars. He was formerly with the Essanay and Pathe Companies and has probably written and directed more of his kind of comedy than any other man in the business. He has been associated with the theater nearly all of his life, and only five years ago took up motion picture directing as a profession. For four years he wrote and directed the first seven of George Ade's fables. Once he was known as "Lightning Hopper the cartoonist," and this title has stuck to him to this day. He is always speeding things up.

"The Silent Command."

A Four-Reel Universal Special Dealing With the Theme of Hypnotic Suggestion.

Reviewed by Robert C. McElravy.

HYPNOTISM has furnished the background for a great many screen stories, creating usually a weird state of apprehension in the mind of the observer. This four-reel production by Robert Leonard, who himself plays the leading role, is no exception to the rule.

From the moment he gazes upon the eyes of evil, of truth and paternal love, as pictured in the close-ups, the feeling grows in the observer that something of an almost uncanny psychological nature is going to occur. This feeling is amply justified and as the story progresses it works out with unexpected strength, considering the familiar pitfalls into which the hypnotic theme usually falls.

At the commencement of the film-drama, a young girl is operated upon by a Dr. Sevani, he of the evil eyes. The father is too poor to pay and when the girl becomes eighteen the doctor demands that she be given over to him for the cause of science. The father naturally objects to this arrangement and here follows a psychological crash between the eyes of evil and the eyes of paternal love. So strong is the father's feeling for the girl that he is able to fight off the doctor's attempted control.

Then follows the crime, in which the father is stabbed while asleep. The girl is seen to rise from her bed at night and walk down to the sitting room, in a hypnotic trance. She stands over her father with a dagger in her hand. This situation rather strains the credulity; the girl is apparently controlled from an unknown distance by the doctor. There is also the question of whether a subject can be induced to commit a crime unless the moral sense has been previously shattered.

But the drama escapes this latter contingency very cleverly, for when the girl's lover, a young lawyer, begins his investigations he learns in time that the girl did not do the stabbing. The crime was committed by a second subject, a servant in control of the doctor, whom the girl had admitted to the house in her trance. This denouement is brought out dramatically in the trial scene at the close.

The cast is pleasing and includes beside Mr. Leonard, Ella Hall, Harry Carter and Alan Forest. Ella Hall gives a strong, consistent handling to the rather difficult part of the girl.

"Silver Threads Among the Gold"

A Somewhat Different Offering, Six Reels to Go with Songs, by K. & R. Film Company.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

THIS is something more than a picture. It is designed to be an evening's entertainment of six reels of film telling a story that will be more than helped out by three songs. The title is chosen as "Silver Threads Among the Gold," that being of the three songs of the picture the most famous as sung by Richard Jose, the tenor singer for whom the offering was made and who has one of the prominent roles in the "Old Homestead" like story that it tells. As an offering it is very likable. Indeed, we feel sure that it will go well and be acceptable to all kinds of people, especially where the songs are sweetly rendered. There is in it, unfortunately, a length of film taken up with a prohibition incident that is not needed as a part of the whole and can easily be left out by wise cutting in the booth. The rest, giving the melodrama, is humanly produced and will surely play upon the audience's laughter and tears. It is the simple, old, rural romance told again freshly and truly.

The first song is "Every Night a Prayer is Said." The good boy (Guy D'Ennery) had been sent away by his harsh father (Richard Jose) when the villain (who dies the death of a drunkard) got him falsely accused of theft. His old mother (a dear old lady as played by Mrs. R. E. French) kneels by his bed and prays for his safe return. The second song is, "Where Is My Wandering Boy." It is moonlight, and the mother is watching cityward over the fence; the father is seen looking at her from a window. The third song is "Silver Threads" and it comes after the son's happy return when the mother forgives her husband for his harshness. This song is not so pertinent as the other two and will not be so powerfully effective, but it surely is well sung by Jose and will be, for itself, pleasing enough.

The offering is full of the good old sincerity. Its opening symbolical scenes are effective. There are thirty-eight principles and a hundred and sixty-five extras in it. The country glimpses—barn dance, straw ride, lovemaking and humor are as fresh as though they were new, and they will all interest. The story runs along smoothly and convincingly; the acting is natural; the heroine (Dora Dean) is acceptable as sweetheart in a melodrama. The backgrounds and photography are also commendable. It can be relied upon, we think, in most big neighborhood theaters; but it will go best with simple-hearted audiences—the majority—whether in city or country.

Pierce Kingsley directed it. Music has been arranged by Maurice Levi, the well known bandmaster.

"The Captive"

Blanche Sweet Gives a Thoroughly Artistic Performance in a Five-Part Lasky Production.

Reviewed by Lynde Denig.

BLANCHE SWEET'S second experience with the Lasky Company—her first was in "The Warrens of Virginia"—is in every way satisfying, for in "The Captive," a five-part picturization of a play by Cecil B. DeMille and Jeanie MacPherson, she has a role of possibilities well in keeping with her personality and histrionic method. This time she is cast as Sonya Martinovitch, a Montenegrin peasant girl of an elementary, sudbued nature; but underneath the rather coarse surface there lies a vein of feminine tenderness and plenty of fire and passion, once they are aroused. It rests with Miss Sweet to bring out the varied qualities of Sonya as she is influenced by the handsome Turkish soldier, made a prisoner in the Balkan War and detailed by the Montenegrin government to cultivate the farm occupied by the peasant girl and her little brother. All the men of the family are fighting their country's battles.

Much of the interest in the picture centers in the expressive by-play of Miss Sweet and House Peters, playing the Turk, a man of noble birth who at the point of a pistol is forced to do the bidding of an ignorant girl. The humor arising out of the odd situation is natural, as is the gradual alteration in the attitude of Sonya toward her prisoner. In numberless little ways she shows the growth of a passion, the meaning of which she scarcely realizes at first, and equally effective is her portrayal of the character under the stress of a fully recognized emotion. The able acting of the two principal players saves several scenes from the charge of being superfluous in the development of the plot.

The story in itself is rather scant for five reels and suffers at the end from an anti-climax and a fortuitous meeting that serves to unite the lovers. But to counterbalance shortcomings there is the excellent acting already mentioned, and the charm of picturesque settings perfectly photographed. The atmosphere of the production is out of the ordinary and of a fine artistic quality, due to a wise choice of locations, care in the furnishing of interiors and painstaking direction. Theodore Roberts, Gerald Ward, Jeanie Mac Pherson, Page Peters and Billy Elmer are in the cast.

Manufacturers' Advance Notes

"FOR THE HONOR OF BETTINA" (Majestic).

Teddy Sampson is the leading figure in a two reel Majestic drama, "For the Honor of Bettina," released in the Mutual program with Frank Bennett and Lloyd Ingraham prominent in the cast. As Bettina Miss Sampson gives one of those large eyed, appealing performances for which she is noted.

Old Giuseppe makes plaster statues and his little granddaughter Bettina, sells them. Above them in the tenement lives Antonio who plays the violin in a cheap cafe. Across the hall an Italian girl of another type resides. She is sophisticated, Americanized, and tempts Bettina, whom she lends clothes to, into joining her on a party given by two of her men friends. Antonio loves Bettina though he has never met her, and when she, Marina and the two men come to his cafe, and leave later in a motor car for a roadhouse, he is shocked.

Scene from "The Honor of Bettina" (Majestic).

That night he waits till they return and then reproaches Marina for leading Bettina astray. This Bettina dislikes.

The following day Tony goes to a cafe with his friend, Talio, an Italian plain clothes man, and is horrified when he sees Bettina enter with the man she was with the evening before. These two are shown to a private room, and, determined to protect her, Tony listens at the door which he breaks down just in time to save Bettina's honor. In the fight the other man is killed, but Talio arranges things so that it looks as if it was suicide.

The Italian girl has learned her lesson and readily forgives Antonio for the reproof of the evening before.

George W. Terwilliger, the Lubin writer and director, has just completed a three-reel spectacular naval drama called "The Insurrection," which promises to attract wide attention and interest, not only because of the story itself but also for the remarkable pictures of almost every branch of the United States Navy in action.

The story has to do with the attempts of a band of South American revolutionists to embroil the United States in a war, and the infatuation of a naval lieutenant for the pretty daughter of the chief revolutionist. Throughout the three reels the naval action is decidedly thrilling and interesting and the Lubin photographers secured some of the best naval action pictures ever taken.

In order to obtain these pictures the Lubin camera men went to Newport, R. I., League Island Navy Yard, Philadelphia, Newport News, Florida, and a number of other places, and obtained splendid motion pictures of submarines, torpedo boat destroyers, battleships—in fact, every type of boat in the navy. The scenes showing a torpedo boat destroyer driving seaward, making thirty-five knots an hour on an official seven-hour test run are remarkable indeed, but no more so than the loading and firing of torpedoes from submarines and destroyers, in which one gets a most intimate idea of the method used abroad at present in breaking up commerce. Navy men have pronounced the battle scenes, especially those taken at night with special lighting effects, magnificent in their realism.

UNITED EXCHANGES FOR TAMPA AND BUTTE.

General Manager R. W. Savini of the United Program Film Service with headquarters at Atlanta, Ga., reports the successful opening of a new branch exchange at Tampa, Florida with offices at 315 Curry Building.

New United Film Service offices have also been opened in Butte, Montana with a comfortable home in the Butte Post Building under the guiding hand of J. C. Woolf of Denver, Colorado, with Manager R. C. Knox in direct charge, while Sidney B. Lust of Washington, D. C., who is manager of the United in that city is preparing for a grand opening to celebrate moving to new quarters at 903 E street, N. "BULLDOGS OF THE TRAIL" (Interstate).

The initial offering of the Interstate Feature Film Co., carrying the title, "Bulldogs of the Trail," and announced for release April 24 through the Picture Playhouse Film Co., is about ready to be sent to the various branch offices of the releasing company.

The Interstate company has headquarters in Middletown, Conn., and is fathered by Kenneth MacDougall, who is not only vice-president of the company, but also plays the male leads in and directs the company's productions. Mr. MacDougall has been a cow-puncher, vaudeville actor, press agent, circus rider and newspaper editor, and has a wealth of personal experiences which will be of unquestioned value to him in the new work which he has undertaken.

"Bulldogs of the Trail" is the story of a relentless search made by enraged Hindus for a sacred jewel which has been stolen, most of the action being laid in the Canadian Northwest, where strenuous incidents in life are quite common. The picture was made in some of the wildest spots in Canada and great care has apparently been taken to make the scenes true to life.

Scene from "Bulldogs of the Trail" (Interstate).

Miss Sydney Shields appears in the leading female role and, although she is a newcomer to the screen, shows ability which promises a great future for her. Miss Shields is well known in the legitimate field, having starred in "Old Reliable" and in the pretentious productions made last season by the Albee Stock Company in Providence, R. I.

ADDITIONS TO THE WORLD FILM STAFF.

Alfred Raymond is a new salesman at the Dallas office of the World Film Corporation. Previous connections were with the Box Office Attractions Company and the Mutual Film Corporation.

W. H. Allen is now travelling out of Indianapolis, having been appointed to that office by Central Division Manager, Mr. Scates.

The Denver office has added to its sales force Hugh Rennie, who was formerly salesman for the Seattle branch.

Walter L. Pavlowsky has been added to the Washington staff of travelling representatives. He graduated from the salesman's school.

"THE TROUBLE MAKER" (MinA).

In this release Harry LaPearl does some slap stick comedy work that ranks with his best efforts in the circus arena, where as producing clown he attained a reputation as the funniest "joy-boy" in clown alley.

Here he appears as a trouble maker with a mania for practical jokes. His first victim is a grocery keeper, whose stock is rapidly diminished as a result of one of Harry's tricks. In his flight from punishment at the hands of the irate grocer, Harry encounters numerous characters, each of whom is in turn subjected to an annoying prank. All goes well for the mischief maker until he roughly handles a display dummy, which suddenly comes to life, gives the joker the thrashing of his days, and then hands him over to the police.

Scene from "The Trouble Maker" (MinA).

Excellent support is given LaPearl by "Spooks" Hanson and Nettie Noges.

On the same reel with "The Trouble Maker" is a cartoon comedy called "Doctor Monko," in which the artist has cleverly depicted the tribulations of Dr. Monko, dentist, in his effort to extract the defective molar of Mr. Hippo.

"MEANS AND MORALS" (Essanay).

That morals and morality are largely matters of means and circumstances is the truth developed in "Means and Morals," a two-reel photodrama distinguished for its subtlety and the knowledge of human nature displayed by H. S. Sheldon, the author. The play deals with the adventures of Irma Carson, a shop-girl who, tired of the meager fare provided by her $6 a week salary, walks the streets to get a good meal. She meets Dick Hardy, a pickpocket, who buys the meal, learns her story and tells her his profession. They part to meet again. Several months after, Dick is caught at his trade in the store which employs Irma. Irma saves him by calling the manager's attention to both his plight and hers. The manager persuades the woman victim of Dick's craft to give him another trial and later he and Irma marry. Edna Mayo and Bryant Washburn as the leading characters bring the tremendous lesson home by their intelligent portrayal of the characters. The play is full of dramatic and heart situations.

Scene from "Means and Morals" (Essanay).

"HER FATHER'S PICTURE" (Lubin).

This is a powerful drama, doubtless one of the most intense the Lubin Company has offered. It is the story of a scheming woman who divorces her first husband to marry another. She leaves a little daughter with the father, who eventually dies and the child is placed in an asylum. Years pass and the second husband is attracted by an actress, who agrees to marry him if he will divorce his wife. The wife discovers the affair and, going to the actress, pleads that she will cease to attract her husband, but is laughed at by the girl and ordered out of her dressing room. The wife then goes to the soubrette's home, intending to kill her, and there discovers a picture of her first husband and realizes that the girl is her own daughter. She flees back to her own house. The husband meets the girl, who tells of the scene on the discovery of the picture. They hasten to the mother's house, but arrive too late to prevent a tragic end.

"ALMOST A KING" (Universal).

Foreign courts, royalty and strutting militarism are delightfully burlesqued in "Almost a King," a two-reel costume comedy featuring Billie Rhodes, Jack Dillon and Lee Moran, which is to be released under the Nestor brand on May 7. The feature comedy embodies a pot pourri of opera bouffe and musical comedy settings and tells a story which reminds one of a travesty on an Anthony Hope or George Barr McCutcheon novel of 'igh life in a Balkan principality.

Moustachioed generals, bemedalled aide-de-campes and frowsy maids-in-waiting are strewn through the pictures with great liberality and the feature comedy should have an especial appeal to Americans who still retain their admiration for the simplicity of the Jeffersonian period in Yankee history.

The proprietor of a Fourth avenue, New York, delicatessen store is discovered to be the heir to a throne in a European kingdom. Just as he is about to marry a beautiful princess his wife and squalling children, following hot on his trail, burst in on the wedding preparations and put the kibosh on the ceremony. Despite the fact that the plot of the play is screamingly funny in itself spectators will enjoy even more the delicious buffoonery and droll characterization of pompous types of European aristocracy with which the action is interspersed.

"The Unbroken Road," adapted from the stage play written by Prof. Thomas W. Dickinson of the University of Wisconsin, the five-part April release of the Life Photo Film Corporation is completed. In this production, Mary Nash, the late star of the Belasco forces, assumes the leading role and is supported by William H. Tooker and Alexander Gaden.

"The Unbroken Road" is the first photoplay production which is preceded by an allegorical prologue, and succeeded by an epilogue based on mythology. The production itself deals with the intrigue of political bosses who seek to down Governor Radford, making capital out of the shattered reputation of a woman, betrayed by the son of a political boss.

Miss Nash, who takes the part of the woman, was compelled to undergo trying experiences in the course of the making of the picture. She was required to permit herself to be buffetted by the waves while fully dressed, and nearly lost her life in the taking of this scene, she having lost hold of a broken mast to which she was clinging. The production will be released April 21.

MARY PICKFORD IN "FANCHON THE CRICKET."

The next Famous Players production starring Mary Pickford will be an artistic film version of the famous drama, "Fanchon the Cricket," by Georges Sand, the celebrated French woman who wrote so many of the great novels of France, to be released on the Paramount Program May 10. The inimitable little star rises to great dramatic heights as the mischievous imp of a girl who was the scorn and by-word of the village and who, under the subtle influence of love, gradually develops a goodness of disposition and a general bend toward virtuous principles whereby she eventually wins the heart of the man she loves, and triumphs gloriously over the envy and hatred of the rustic community of which she has been a despised and rejected member.

Mary Pickford as "Fanchon" portrays with a great power of conception all the dramatic depths and the varying lights and shades in this famous character. There is a naturalness about her impersonation—a sparkling, quaint originality—that will undoubtedly make this role as popular as her memorable characterization in "Tess of the Storm Country."

MUSIC HATH CHARMS.

Deagan Electric Unaphone—Calliope Big Factor in Chicago's Mayoralty Campaign.

On April 6, William Hale Thompson was elected Mayor of Chicago by a majority more than double that ever awarded any of his predecessors—147,000 votes. Mr. Thompson's campaign committee solved the publicity problem in a unique way. Instead of the enormous expenditure of a Brass Band, the Committee for more than eight weeks prior to election daily canvassed Chicago's streets with a Deagan Electric Unaphone-Calliope. This instrument which weighs only about 100 pounds, was carried in an automobile, the latter equipped with suitable announcement banners. That it was effective is evidenced by the returns.

The Unaphone attracted far more attention than would have been possible with a ten or fifteen-piece brass band and the expense was about 97 per cent. less. Wherever it appeared on the street an admiring throng gathered, as its music is appreciated by old and young alike.

The popularity of this instrument has also found its way to the "Zone" at the Panama Exposition, as already a number of concessionaires there are using it. Among them are the well-known Old Nurnberg Restaurant, Panma Canal Exhibition, Toyland, Tehuantepec Village, etc.

Ringling Bros., Al. G. Barnes, James Carnival Circus, Evans Dog and Pony Show and others are among well known users, while Exhibitors, State Rights Men, Dancing Academies, Passenger Boats, Pavilions, etc., find it an advertising medium par excellence—one that not only draws but holds the crowds.

The manufacturers of the Unaphone—the J. G. Deagan Company of Chicago, are constantly besieged with inquiries, and so insistent has been the demand especially among traveling shows and amusement park concessionaires, that the firm is far behind its orders.

RADIUM GOLD FIBRE SCREEN, INC., IN CANDLER BUILDING.

Radium gold fibre screens acquired increased activity through the formation of a new company, Radium Gold Fibre Screen, Inc., which has just opened offices and projection rooms on the tenth floor of the Candler Building, 220 West 42d street, New York City. The officers of Radium Gold Fibre Screen, Inc., are: President, Henry J. Brock; vice-president and general manager, Robert T. Kane, and treasurer, J. L. Kempner.

Under this corps of officers the output will be increased. The factory at East Orange, N. J., has been enlarged and plans are being drawn for a new factory which will shortly be erected to supply the Middle West. The screen itself will be improved, the coming output being "in the nature of a radium gold fibre screen de luxe," according to General Manager Kane. Distribution will be through the most prominent exchanges and accessory dealers as heretofore.

Frank T. Highfield has been retained as factory superintendent. Mr. Highfield has been superintending the manufacture of radium gold fibre screens since the first one appeared seven years ago.

"THE RING OF DEATH" (Lubin).

As the story progresses, as we say, "the plot thickens." Gilbert Jerome proves himself to be a star villain. He thinks that the country boy, Abner Gray, is his only rival and plots to have him arraigned for the murder of Gershom. In this he is successful and the boy is sentenced to be hanged, much to the agony of Alene, who foolishly told that Abner wears the ring which she saw on the mystic hand grasping the curtain the night of the tragedy. Another important character is in this number placed in the cast. She is a woman who claims Gilbert to be her husband and will doubtless be heard from as the story proceeds. A combination of circumstances causes Alene to be left entirely at the mercy of Jerome, with the horror on her mind that Abner Gray's life will be taken because she told the story of the ring. This act is very strong in cast, and John Ince, the director, is infusing the limit of intensity into the action of the story.

BIG CONTRACT GIVEN PIETRO.

The Piedmont Amusement Company through its General Booking Manager, W. R. Wilkerson, has just completed negotiations with Pietro Diero, the accordion player, to appear for a week in every house throughout its circuit, covering a period of ten weeks, as an extra added attraction, together with its general run of feature pictures. The contract offered Pietro was, without doubt, the most alluring he has ever received, and although reluctant at first to accept, it was made so attractive he affixed his signature to same. Pietro opens at the Piedmont theater, Greensboro, N. C., Monday, April 19.

NEW BUFFALO OFFICE FOR WORLD FILM.

The Buffalo World Film office will move May 1 to the corner of Swan and Main streets, where they will have 3800 sq. ft. of floor space. M. E. Hoffman who has been in Buffalo arranging for the transfer, tells us that when the new office is fitted up it will be the finest in the state, outside of New York City. The old office at Swan and Pearl streets has been very inadequate to handle the rapidly growing business.

"TOLD IN THE ROCKIES" (Lariat).

One of the most striking examples of the determined policy of the United Film Service to raise the standard and quality of the short story photoplay, on which it has focused its attention of late, is to be found in the intensely dramatic and wonderfully artistic two-reel picture, "Told In the Rockies," which has recently been made by the Lariat Company in the charming setting surrounding their studio in the Garden of the Gods. The simple life of mountain folk in all its picturesqueness is shown. The mountain scenery is used in all its splendors as a background, which qualities alone would mark the picture as an altogether unusual one, if nothing could be said of the splendid portrayal of the cast. There are 25 people actually in the play and the company is headed by the well-known photoplayers as Joseph West and William V. Mong, who wrote the scenario and assisted in directing the picture. Perhaps one of the most fascinating actors from the onlookers' point of view is Francisco Trujille, the little Indian boy who is eight years old and who is making his first appearance in motion pictures with his mother and father and baby brother in this film. The members of this family are genuine Apache Indians. The papoose is only one and one-half years old. The remainder of this strong and able cast is made up of De Leon C. Livingston, Ester Hough, Otis B. Thayer, the director, Wharton Jones, Joseph Allen, Margery Smith, Dan B. Hosmer, Mabel Betzler, S. J. Dyer, Phil Jossenberger, F. D. Hahnenkratt, Vic Frith, A. A. Thayer, M. E. Schuck, John Aubrey, Mary Z. Standiford, Daphne Smith, Paul Callahan and Herman Betsler.

THEATER SPECIALTY MFG. CO. ENLARGES.

Increased activity among exhibitors in their efforts to make the lobby attractive has resulted in the Theater Specialty Mfg. Co., of Cleveland, O., receiving a large number of orders, thereby making it necessary to add to this firm's force of employes. In the plant, extra carpenters, joiners and brass workers have been engaged and the office has been augmented by a sales department.

M. A. Malaney, formerly with the General Film Co., is the new sales manager for this brass frame concern. Already his efforts are being felt in the shop as the force has been working nights for two weeks.

G. W. Armstrong, president of the Theater Specialty Mfg. Co., attributes most of the increased business to the high quality of his goods and the fact that he has an efficient force to explain the merits of his frames and railings to prospective customers. He also believes that the theaters are experiencing a return to normal business conditions as the activity in his line would indicate.

BUSINESS IMPROVING THROUGHOUT SOUTH.

J. Walter Lamb, Atlanta manager of the World Film Corporation says that the Republic Theater at Jacksonville, Fla. has been using World Film one day each week, but now they have increased their run to two days. The Strand Theater, of Nashville, Tenn., which was also using World Film features in a one day run, has increased the time of engagement for such features to three days. The Grand Theater, Atlanta, which plays a two day run, is the largest photoplay house in the South and the seating capacity is 2,000. Mr. Lamb has booked the Vanderbilt Cup Race picture to the Strand Theater, Atlanta, for the entire week commencing April 26th, and has several other prospects among the most representative houses in the South to play this single reel feature on weekly runs.

WILL OPEN LONDON OFFICE.

Announcement has been made that within the next thirty days the Picture Playhouse Film Co., with main offices at No. 71 West Twenty-third street, New York City, will open a branch office in London. The company already have about a dozen offices in the more important cities in the United States.

"PROHIBITION" IN POLITICS.

The feature film "Prohibition" will probably play an important part in the preliminary campaign work for the presidential election of 1916, as already the Prohibition Party, always sought by the major parties as being one of the balances of power, are preparing to use it in winning votes for the cause.

In Washington this week, the exhibition and support of the picture as a vote-winning measure, was discussed and warmly recommended, and it is not unlikely that the Prohibition Party will adopt it as their national "film organ."

Dr. P. A. Baker, general superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League of America, in charge of the "dry" legation at Washington, is actively promulgating a physical demonstration before the very doors of Congress with thousands of men and women wearing white ribbons. One ardent and daring "dry" suggested the idea of giving an exhibition of "Prohibition" on the actual wall of the House of Congress, spreading a sheet over the classic marble and projecting through the dark of night by agency of a powerful and giant lens.

Robert T. Kane, President of the Prohibition Film Corporation, at his offices at 220 West 42d street, New York, this week also reported that he has received and will accept the powerful aid of the Gideons, the national association of traveling men, who through their probity belie the usual stage idea of the wild living drummer. This organization, it will be remembered, put bibles in almost every room in every hotel in the country. They now propose to similarly distribute literature on "Prohibition," believing that by the powerful lessons contained much good will be accomplished.

KNUTE ERICKSON IN CORT FILMS.

The Harry Cort Comedy Film Company, of which Harry Cort, son of John Cort, is president, has announced the first line of comedy films which are to be issued by the concern. Work has already started on them in spite of the fact that the studio which the company is to have in upper Manhattan has not been completed.

The first films which will be made are a series of episodes in which the principal character will be "Daffy Dan," a popular comic conceit by Knute Erickson, who has been on the stage in such style of buffoonery for many years. The scenarios for these comedy films have been written by George E. Stoddard, who wrote "The Isle of Spice" and "The Royal Chef."

Knute Erickson is well known in the west especially for his impersonation of comedy characters of the Scandinavian sort much in demand in many towns and cities throughout the country. He made a big success in "Yon Yonson" and other serio-comedies of the same kind. He has had twenty years of experience on the stage.

The Harry Cort Comedy Film Company expects to make regular comedy releases and will have sufficient room in the new studio to do anything along the line planned. The studio will have four stages of comfortable proportions.

MARION LEONARD IN "ZIRA."

Miss Marion Leonard is almost finished with "Mrs. Dane's Defense" and as soon as the remaining scenes have been taken the picture will be in shape for release, although it has not yet been announced what plans have been made for releasing the six-reeler, and S. E. V. Taylor, director of the piece, refuses to make any statement whatsoever on the matter.

Miss Leonard is being supported by a splendid cast, including Charles Dalton and Miss Mabel Montgomery. Mr. Dalton is well known on the legitimate stage, but this is the first time he has played for the film.

Mr. Taylor had already unofficially announced his plans for the next big picture and it was generally understood that "Hearts Aflame" was to be reproduced, but this plan has been subordinated and "Zira" will be put on instead, with Miss Leonard taking the part played so long and successfully by Margaret Anglin.

MINUSA SCREEN IN ST. LOUIS HIPPODROME.

The Minusa Cine Products Company of St. Louis has just completed the construction and installation of the special made screen for the Hippodrome of St. Louis. Many difficulties not ordinarily encountered were overcome before perfect screen results were obtained. Foremost among these adverse conditions was the extreme width of the house inside (83 ft.). This width would ordinarily cause a great deal of fade-away and distortion to the side, so a very rough moulded surface was used and the results are fine. A perfect picture is shown from all seats. Col. Al F. Oldham will be in charge of the house and will open with The Heart of Maryland. The Hippodrome seats 2,500. The prices charged for the best feature program will be five and ten cents.

POWER'S SIX A AT BALTIMORE BALL.

The Nicholas Power Company, manufacturers of the famous motion picture projecting machines Power's Six A, was well represented at the recent ball of the Baltimore branch of the M. P. E. L. of America by Bill Barry, Advertising Manager of that concern. Mr. Barry is one of the best known men in the business and also is Secretary of the Screen Club, the famous organization of screen players in New York City.

Americas a Picture Field

South and Central Americas Fertile Ground for American Motion Pictures, Say Consuls—Reason Why European Made Films Have Good Standing Attributed to the Manufacturers Opening Branches and Agencies There—All Classifications of American Pictures Are Popular.

ARGENTINA.

By Consul William Dawson, Jr., Rosario.

THERE are some eighteen establishments at Rosario which make use of motion pictures. Of these only three are motion picture theaters that charge admission; the remainder are cafes, which provide motion pictures to attract crowds. The three theaters charging admission have a capacity of about 500 each. They are well appointed and have substantially the same patronage as other theaters. Motion pictures are very popular, and some of the leading so-called legitimate theaters run films when their stages are not occupied. The last picture theater opened charges 42 cents admission; a box seat costs $1.27 plus $0.42 admission for each spectator.

The cafes that run motion pictures draw large crowds. No admission is charged, though, of course, spectators are under obligation to order refreshments. Some of the larger and more centrally located cafes have continuous picture entertainment from 5.30 to 7.30 and from 9 to 11.30 or 12 p. m. The motion picture is popular throughout the district. The smaller cities and towns of the interior offer a market in proportion to their population. Imports of films are first shown separately in Argentine customs statistics in 1910. The total annual imports since that time have been: 1910, 16744 pounds; 1911, 43,380 pounds; 1912, 19,742 pounds; 1913, 7,518 pounds; first six months of 1914, 3,371 pounds.

Films via Parcel Post—Rental Charges.

While the above figures apparently indicate a falling off in imports of films, Rosario representatives of Buenos Aires importers state that this is not the case, that, on the contrary, the demand for films has tended to increase. They attribute the decrease to modifications in regulations granting increased facilities for importation by "encomienda" or parcel service. My informants state that films are now imported by parcel post or express, and thus come under the heading "encomiendas" in customs statistics. It appears that this enables importers to clear goods within a few hours after arrival, which is, of course, important for new films. My informants also point out that American films are received largely via Europe on account of better shipping facilities, and that imports of American films are undoubtedly considerably larger than would appear from customs returns.

Motion pictures are entered exclusively at Buenos Aires. They are imported largely by two concerns: Max Glücksmann, Callo 45, Buenos Aires (representing Pathe Freres), and the Sociedad General Cinematográfica (Ltda.), Lavalle 464, Buenos Aires (representing Gaumont). These firms have branches at Rosario, one of which operates two motion picture theaters, and are represented by branch offices or agents in all the principal centers of the district. Although each represents an important French manufacturer, both firms handle a considerable variety of other films. I am informed that films are also imported by other concerns at Buenos Aires. As far as can be learned there are no independent film importers at Rosario.

Films are rented to theaters and cafes. All the leading establishments change their program daily. The rental price depends on the number of films taken. The largest customers take 20 reels a day, for which they pay a rental of $340 per month. As films are changed daily, this makes an average of 57 cents per reel per day. Customers who take a less number pay, of course, more per film. An establishment that rents films occasionally and has no regular contract pays 64 cents per reel. These are Rosario prices. At interior points prices are somewhat higher for the same service. An extra charge is made for color films.

Kinds in Demand.

There is a demand for all classifications, regardless of length of subject. American films are very popular and are considered excellent as regards workmanship. The only objection raised is that subjects are not sufficiently varied; as one manager puts it, they almost invariably refer to the Wild West or the Civil War. It may be pointed out, however, that as American films come largely via Europe and are handled principally by firms in close touch with French and other European manufacturers the apparent sameness of subject may be due to the fact that the chief demand is for those subjects that are distinctively American and cannot be obtained elsewhere.

If, as appears likely, importers experience difficulty in securing European films as a result of the war, American film makers should have a good opening there.

BRAZIL.

By Consul Robert Frazer, Jr., Bahia.

Motion picture shows are very popular in Bahia and are sometimes for long periods the only form of theatrical or spectacular entertainment offered here. There are five houses giving daily and four giving triweekly exhibitions in this city and about sixty in the whole State. The system of buying films, in this part of Brazil at least, has been almost entirely superseded by that of renting them through agents of the various film manufacturers located at Rio de Janeiro. The owner of three of the largest houses here, who has had experience dating from the time when it was customary to buy films outright, states that this change has had the effect of centralizing the business at the capital and making it no longer profitable for importers at other cities to buy their films, as they formerly did, with the idea of renting them in the small interior towns when they themselves had finished with them.

Purchased European films cost on the average about 9.1 cents United States currency per foot (taking the milreis at its present value of about 27 cents) laid down here, including duties and all expenses, while they may be rented from the Rio de Janeiro agencies at 1.2 to 1.6 cents per foot per week. Under this system the films remain the property of the manufacturers, who merely rent them through their Brazilian agents on commission. After they are shown as much as possible in this country the manufacturer instructs the agent where to send the films for further exhibition or, if they are worn out, has them returned to the factory.

Duty—Manufacturers Represented—Subjects—Machines.

The duty on films is 25 milreis per kilo, but as part of this is paid in gold it works out in practice, with accompanying expenses, to about 39 paper milreis per kilo, or with surtax about $5.39 per pound. European pictures are the most in use, but occasionally American pictures are also seen. The reason why the European picture is so popular is largely because American manufacturers have no agents here and have not made as consistent efforts as their competitors to get the business. Practically all subjects—drama, comedy, reviews of contemporary events, etc.—are well received, except tragedy films, which only in exceptional cases please the Bahia public. In spite of the war, films are still being received from Europe, though in smaller number and more irregularly, so that the present should be an excellent opportunity to increase the use of the products of the United States.

PARAGUAY.

By Consul Samuel Hamilton Wiley, Asuncion.

Motion picture theaters constitute the only form of amusement in Asuncion. Though this form of entertainment has been but recently introduced, there are five motion picture theaters now operating in Asuncion, and there is talk of opening others. Those operating here at present are the Teatro Nasional, with an approximate seating capacity of 1,200; the Recreo Holmer, seating about 250; the Belvedere, 300; the Cafe de la Bolsa, 300; the Royal Cinema, 250.

Each of these gives one show per night, with matinees on Sundays and feast days, with a daily change of program. The performances begin at 9 p. m. and continue until about 11.30 p. m. The seats in nearly all the theaters are divided into two clases, orchestra seats and boxes, the admission charged being approximately 25 and 35 cents United States currency, respectively.

Sources and Cost—Popular Subjects.

All the films exhibited in Asuncion are rented from agencies in Buenos Aires, as the demand for pictures is not sufficient to warrant the establishment of an agency here. The managers of the local theaters pay a certain sum per month for film service, it amounting to approximately $500 United States currency. Films are sent up from Buenos Aires by river steamer, nine days being consumed in the round trip. This nine-day period being a loss of nine days' exhibition of the films, the cost of the service is therefore rather high. No duty is paid on films comifg in for exhibition which are to be returned. The films most popular with audiences in Asuncion are detective stories, melodramas, historical dramas, and the weekly reviews of current events. American films showing cowboy and Indian scenes have been well received also. There is a decided preference for plots in five, six, or more reels; as the audiences here go to the theater for the whole evening, they prefer a continuous drama of some length rather than several one-reel pictures.

Reading Matter in Spanish—Films in Public Favor.

Films for exhibition in Paraguay must have reading matter in Spanish, the language of the country. The posters accompanying films for advertising purposes must also be in Spanish. The manager of one of the theaters in which several American films have been exhibited said he attributed the lack of interest in these films to the fact that the reading matter and posters were in English. Pictures made in Europe are mostly shown here, with an American made picture at distant intervals. American films would be well received here, especially the feature dramas produced by some of the American companies.

URUGUAY.

By Consul Herman L. Spahr, Montevideo.

Motion picture theaters in Uruguay are numerous and well attended. In Montevideo, the capital (estimated population 375,503), there are 54 picture theaters, with a total seating capacity of 27,200. The theaters do not import films direct, but are supplied by two Buenos Aires rental agencies which have branches here.

Motion picture theaters in Montevideo as a rule give only one exhibition a day, lasting from 9 to 12 p. m., but matinees from 3 to 6 p. m. are given on Sundays and holidays and frequently on other days. An entertainment is invariably divided into three sections of about 45 minutes each, with intermissions (between sections) of 10 to 15 minutes' duration. The spectator may and often does buy a ticket for one or two sections. Prices of admission range in ordinary times, according to class of theater, from 25 to 50 cents (gallery cheaper), but all theaters have reduced their prices since the European conflict began.

Sections are often complete in themselves, but managers prefer a drama lasting two sections (an hour and a half), because the patrons will then generally stay through the whole performance, the two sections costing nearly as much as three. Long films comprising a whole show are rather rare and are seldom shown more than three nights. The theaters change the program of one section every day, and no section is shown more than three times. The same film may appear in three houses in one day and in many in the course of a month.

Character of Pictures—Market for American Films.

Dramas and detective films lead in popularity, followed by comedies, spectacles, current events, and war scenes. Cowboy and Indian plays were liked until overworked, and still appear at intervals. The average rental paid by the best houses for a first run picture is about $400 a month, the agency to supply material for a change of one section daily, so that, for example, the equivalent of thirty one-section plays must be furnished. Unlike in other lands, summer is not a period of depression in the picture business here, for the nights are cool, while in winter there is no provision for heating the buildings. The popularity of American films is unquestioned, and manufacturers not already in the field should not delay if they intend to enter.

Care should be taken to pack the films in a cylinder and this in a wooden box. Complaint has been made of the disappearance of films en route, so that it would seem advisable to provide by insurance or other means against loss. Inset translations should be in good Spanish.

COSTA RICA.

By Consul C. Donaldson, Port Limon.

There are two theaters in Port Limon, both of which are devoted almost exclusively to motion pictures. The films used are the same as those displayed at San Jose and other interior cities, and there is a change of program nightly. All the films are rented, the price ranging from $11 to $25, according to the length and other value-making features of the reel. There is a strong preference for feature dramas of three to six reels, but society plays, Wild West scenes, comic sketches, etc., are also popular.

Most of the films used in this district are French, with a few Italian, but scarcely any American. However, in spite of the tendency on the part of theater managers to favor the French films, it is very noticeable that audiences grow enthusiastic over an American Wild West picture or a society drama showing the home life of an American family. Scenes in Mexico and Argentina are also well liked.

Adapting to New Law

Kansas City Exchanges Who Sell Booking in Kansas Will Bear Censorship Charges—Would Be Too Heavy for Exhibitors—Dates for Releases Set Far Ahead in Hope of Getting Them Passed in Time for Showing.

Special to Moving Picture World from Kansas City News Service.

THERE are several important phases of the Kansas censorship law that exchange men in Kansas City have to consider, and a great deal of plotting and planning has to be done to hold together the big business transacted with the Kansas exhibitors. Most of the exchanges have agreed to pay the cost of censorship in Kansas, which is $2 a reel. The reason for this is that the exhibitor could not afford to do this and run a five cent show for five cents or a ten cent show for ten cents; if the exchanges did not have their pictures censored the exhibitors would be forced out of business, and later the film exchanges would probably have to dissolve.

But the worst difficulty does not end with this. The film companies send about a hundred new reels into the State of Kansas every few days. The service must remain as complete and as thorough as it has been or all the exhibitors in the state will be showing old pictures. The work will be more likely to require the services not of the two already appointed, but of eight, to get the reels censored on time.

So incomplete have the arrangements been that the state has no place to censor the films and must necessarily borrow the theaters of the exhibitors in Topeka. The film exchanges in Kansas City have decided to set the date of their Kansas releases far ahead and send their pictures to Topeka to be censored about a month before they are to be released. This is expected to work out in good shape for the present and will probably be adjusted later, when the state realizes the vast amount of work that it has before it.

The film exchanges of Kansas City claim that this law is taking about half the profits from them, but that it is better this way than to take 99 per cent of the profits of the exhibitor. Nearly all the companies have their booking agents out in the field and report that they are booking the pictures just as they have been before and that the bookings have increased instead of decreased since most of the companies have taken the stand that they have taken in the matter.

CHIEF CENSOR ROSS WILL RENT THEATER IN TOPEKA

Will Have to View Many Films—Inspectorship Jobs Ready.

W. D. Ross, of Topeka, who is chief inspector of all the films that come into the state under the new law, has given out some information that the exhibitors and film companies have been waiting for. He intends to rent a theater in Topeka for the inspection until permanent quarters can be arranged at the state house. It is said that no effort will be made to censor the pictures that are already showing in the state, of which there is more than 5,000 reels. The films are being sent into the state, according to Mr. Ross, at the rate of 122 reels a week, and this will require the services of several inspectors. It is said that one inspector cannot work more than three hours a day without suffering serious injury to his eyes, and this will create many political jobs for the legislators who made the law.

BAGGOT POPULAR IN KANSAS.

King Baggot has not lost any of his drawing ability at the moving picture theaters, especially in the Middle West. When Baggot is to be featured in a picture the local exhibitors usually jump all over the opportunity of advertising him extensively and the result is that Baggot draws just as large if not a larger audience to the theater showing the moving pictures than any other actor on the stage. His drawing ability recently filled the Hippodrome at Leavenworth, Kan., which is some feat for one lone star.

CENSORING THE POLITICIANS.

It has long been the custom since the moving picture business opened in Kansas to show slides of the candidates for the various public offices on the screens during their campaign for office. The moving picture exhibitors say that there are several candidates in the field for election and re-election to the legislature that will not be able to have their slides shown any place in the state during the next campaign, and that there are several who will be able to have their slides shown. They have decided to give themselves and the other people of Kansas a fair legislation if it is possible for the screens to help in this matter.

TOPEKA ACTRESS SIGNS WITH LASKY COMPANY.

Ina Claire, of Topeka, Kan., has signed a contract to appear in moving pictures under the personal directions of Jesse L. Lasky for the next few years. Miss Claire has appeared in several moving picture plays and scored a big hit in "The Quaker Girl." Miss Claire's home is in Topeka, but her work will keep her in New York and other cities where the Lasky plays are produced.

KANSAS SHORTER NOTES.

Helmuth Dueberg was in Topeka recently with the German war pictures. He gave an interesting history of the taking of the pictures and declares that five camera men were killed in making the pictures. One of the pictures shows the camera men seemingly caught between the opposing lines during a charge of the German infantry. The camera men that took the pictures received $500 a day, Mr. Dueberg says, and the job was cheap at the price. Several of the bloodiest scenes were eliminated by the Pennsylvania censors, but the remainder of the films show that the pictures are really those of a war. Some of them are of the armies in camp and in the trenches and others show fierce charges and the firing of big guns.

Laurence D. Kitchell was in Topeka with the travelogue showing moving pictures of the Glacier National Park. Mr. Kitchell lectured on the trip and gave the Topeka people a chance to see a portion of America first. The pictures and lecture was the first of a series planned by the Shriners to raise funds to send Marshall's band to the coast.

The Iris theater, at Hutchinson, recently showed "The Storm." The theater has been using the Universal service for some time, and they report that they have to sell standing room to every nightly show.

The De Luxe theater, at Hutchinson, Kan., ran the picture "Damon and Pythias" recently. The Knights of Pythias at the various cities where this picture has been shown have turned out in full force to see it.

H. P. Wareham, owner of the Wareham theater, at Manhattan, Kan., has announced that he will remodel the theater and build an addition to the College Inn. The change will add 500 seats to the theater and 40 new rooms to the College Inn. A ventilator system similar to those in use in the large moving picture theaters in Kansas City will be installed. Two 36-inch fans will be used, one to bring the fresh air in and the other to take the dead air out.

The Iris, at Topeka recently entertained its audience with Alice Dovey in "The Commanding Officer." The theater drew a big crowd for this picture and has been operating the Paramount service with great success.

George Meeker, owner of the Princess, at Leavenworth, Kan., has changed the name of the theater to the Jitney. The theater is showing the program of the General Film.

The Rex, at Hutchinson, Kan., has shown several good bills of pictures lately, among which appeared the names of some of the prominent actors and actresses—Pearl White, Arnold Daly, Edna Payne and H. Stanley. Pictures taken of the animals at the Selig Jungle Zoo scored a big hit at the theater.

MISSOURI NEWS LETTER.

THE Board of Appeals, relating to moving picture shows in Kansas City, now has a woman member. Miss Anna C. Gilday, a teacher in the Manual Training High School, and a sister of Leo M. Gilday, County Clerk of Jackson County, Missouri, was appointed by Mayor Jost to succeed Trigg A. Long, who recently resigned. The other members of the board are Judge H. C. McDougal and Battle McCardle. Miss Gilday has been prominent in organized charity and reform work in the city, and although her ideas are somewhat radical she is well qualified for the office.

Fred Savage, manager of the Iris, De Luxe and Rex theaters, at Hutchinson, Kan., recently paid Kansas City a visit and left with a contract for the Paramount service.

The moving picture business in Kansas City is beginning to pick up. Most of the owners of the large theaters in the residence sections of the city are making arrangements for the opening of airdomes. This business promises to be a big one this summer unless the city council ties it up as it did last year.

The Willis Wood theater drew one of the largest crowds of the year at a Tuesday night performance of "The Devil" last week. They are now showing the Universal pictures taken under the sea. The pictures have been well advertised and they will probably draw more than any others that they have thus far shown.

L. A. Sheridan, traveler for the Pathe Exchange, was in the city recently, having returned from a trip on the Southern Missouri territory. He reports that the business is picking up there in fine style and he brought back better booking than he has ever done before on this territory. This is saying a great deal, for Mr. Sheridan brings in work from all the territory.

H. E. Jameyson, who has been out on the Kansas territory for the last three weeks, has been sending in many good bookings. Mr. Jameyson says that he finds that the theaters are going to make the law kill them off before they quit the business. He left last week for the Oil country and will make Cushing the chief point of attack on the exhibitors there.

A. W. Lee, owner of the Majestic, at Bowling Green, Mo., is erecting a new moving picture theater there. The house is to be built entirely of stucco and is to be one of the most up to date theaters in the state. The patronage of the house has almost outgrown its capacity and Mr. Lee believes that he needs two theaters to accommodate the crowds there.

The Star, at Columbia, Mo., has been pleasing its audiences of college students with pictures of college life. The Vitagraph comedy, "Cutey at College," scored a big hit with the patrons recently and they are demanding more pictures of the same brand.

The Majestic, at Chillicothe, Mo., now has the Paramount service, and the programs there have been attracting large crowds to the theater every night and afternoon.

Terence O'Rourke, in "A Captain of Villainy," proved such a good picture at the Star, at Columbia, Mo., that it had to be transferred to the Annex theater, which is under the same management.

E. T. Davies, proprietor of the Leader, Windsor, Mo., has secured "The Master Key" for his theater.

The Jefferson, at Springfield, Mo., has arranged for several feature plays far in advance. The Jefferson does this frequently and advertises them well before they are shown. Florence Reed in "The Dancing Girl," and Macklin Arbuckle in "No Laughing Matter" are billed for a date in the near future.

Children's Feature Films

Louisville Corporation Formed to Produce Features for Younger Patrons—Will Make Screen Versions of Classics, Fairy Tales and Historical Subjects, as Well as Educationals—Programs and Business Experience of Firm Will Be Interesting.

By G. D. Crain, Jr., Louisville Correspondent of Moving Picture World.

THE Children's Feature Film Corporation, of Louisville, has been formed with the intention of producing plays for use in children's theaters throughout the country. The concern is to be incorporated with a capital stock of $20,000. Officers of the company will be Thomas J. Morrow, president; Norman M. Sweet, secretary-treasurer, and Roy W. Conant, general manager and temporary producer. The company expects not only to produce the pictures, but operate its own exchanges to distribute its products. Mr. Sweet, who was formerly in the theatrical business, has announced that the slogan of the concern will be "Pictures My Children Can See." The productions will include classics, fairy tales and historical and educational films. Temporary offices have been opened in the Starks building and arrangements have been made for a temporary studio. The Censorship Board of Children's Motion Pictures, at a recent meeting at the Masonic theater, heartily approved the new organization. A series of resolutions was introduced and unanimously passed. The producing company has agreed to submit all scenarios to the local board of censorship before the pictures are produced. During the past few months the demand for special children's motion pictures has been very large, due to the many larger towns which took up the idea, which was started in Louisville. The supply of children's pictures has not been equal to the demand and in some cases good material could not be obtained. The new company is not the first of its kind in the country, as the Oz Film Company has the same aim. The new company will be warmly supported by the local board in its efforts to produce clean pictures.

ALF. OLDHAM TO MANAGE THE HIPPODROME.

Alf V. Oldham, one of the best known residents of Louisville, and who for several years was a factor in local amusement circles, has accepted the management of the Hippodrome, of St. Louis, which has a seating capacity of 2,500, and is one of the largest theaters in the city. Mr. Oldham is one of the owners and was the manager of the Woodland Amusement Company, which successfully maintained the Woodland Airdome. Motion pictures will be featured at the big St. Louis house. Mr. Oldham for a number of years was in the service of the city of Louisville as Clerk of the City Court. For a time he was connected with the racing game and owned the brilliant campaigner Col. Jim Douglas, one of the most popular horses which ever raced over the Kentucky turf.

IT'S A GOOD IDEA.

It has been suggested that a number of the moving picture houses should carry the time of their various shows in their advertisements and announcements. For instance the evening shows, as a rule, start at 6, 7.30 and 9 o'clock. In some cases a five-reel production is run and the shows are soon several minutes ahead of time. A show scheduled to start at 3 o'clock was half over on one occasion when it was due to start, and it was necessary for the patrons to see the last part first, which is anything but agreeable. Announcements could readily be made to carry the correct hours of the performances and the various run off made to conform with these hours.

THE SHELBY THEATRE OPENS.

The Shelby, at Shelby and Oak streets, in Louisville, was formally opened to the public on Saturday, April 10. The new theater will seat about 800 people and cost about $20,000 to build. The management will show General films.

Announcement has been made that the West End Colonels, a club of Louisville, will not operate the airdome maintained by the club last summer, but that several of the club members will operate the airdome as an incorporated company. The plant will be opened on May 15. Two new machines have already been purchased by the promoters. Henry Wempe will be manager of the concern.

Judge Allen Kinney, of the Princess Amusement Company, and L. J. Dittmar, of the Majestic Amusement Company, have made arrangements whereby a publicity department will be established at the Star theater, which will be under the care of J. Johnson Mussellman. The department will handle the publicity, advertising, etc., for the Star, Majestic, Orpheum and Casino theaters. Kinney and Dittmar jointly own the Star theater. The Orpheum and Casino are owned by the Princess, of which Judge Kinney is president. Mr. Dittmar is president of the Majestic Amusement Company. It is probable that some of the advertisements will be handled on the co-operative basis. The Star, Casino and Orpheum are all five-cent theaters, while the Majestic is a ten-cent house.

The Owl Machine & Supply Company has been organized as a branch of the Owl Feature Film Company. The concern is not incorporated. The new department will handle the moving picture supplies, machines, etc., which were formerly handled through the film company.

J. H. Jacobs, of Carrollton, Ky., has made arrangements to operate the "Pearl," a colored motion picture house at Thirteenth and Walnut streets. The theater has been closed for a number of months.

Building Code Changes

In Pennsylvania, Four Bills Revising Building Code for Motion Picture Theaters Introduced by Senator Snyder of Schuylkill—Reported Out for Printing—Senator Daix's Censor Bill a Gold Mine for Job Hunting Politicians.

Special to Moving Picture World from Philadelphia News Service.

FOUR bills, designed to remedy defects in the laws relating to the construction of moving picture theaters in Philadelphia and the regualtion of such places with regard to fire protection, were recently presented in the Senate at Harrisburg, by Senator Snyder of Schuylkill county. The bills were drafted to overcome certain objections in the present laws affecting moving picture theaters in Philadelphia recently declared unconstitutional by Judge Audenreid in the Court of Common Pleas. The Senate Judiciary Special Committee immediately reported the bills out for printing.

One of the bills amends the supplement of June 5, 1901, to the act of May 5, 1899, creating the Philadelphia Bureau of Building Inspection, by exempting from the supplement buildings used for the purpose of exhibiting moving picture productions. Another bill exempts from the operation of the moving picture act of June 9, 1911, buildings in actual use for moving picture exhibitions prior to the passage of the act, and still another legalizes the erection prior to May 20, 1913, of certain buildings used for moving picture exhibitions.

Senator Daix, of Philadelphia, recently introduced a bill in the Senate, at Harrisburg, providing for the repeal of the present moving picture censorship law and substituting an entirely new act. Mr. Daix stated that the bill was forwarded to him by J. Louis Breitinger, the present censor, who declared that the bill had the hearty cooperation of Governor Brumbaugh and the Attorney General.

The new bill provides for a board of three, to be appointed by the Governor, to serve for terms of three years. The chairman of the commission is to be a man at a salary of $3,000 per year, the vice-president a woman at $2,500 and the third member to act in the capacity of a secretary at $2,400.

The bill declares that the board shall approve all films which are moral and proper and that they shall disapprove of any that are improper, sacrilegious, obscene, indecent or immoral, or tend in the judgment of the board to debase or corrupt, incite or prejudice the public mind. The bill gives the board power to regulate advertising matter.

A fee of $2.50 is to be charged for the examination of 1,200 feet or less of film and $1 for each duplicate if applied for at the same time by the same person. Over 1,200 feet the fee is to be $5 and $2 for all duplicates. All fees are to be paid into the State Treasury.

The bill provides for a fine of $50 to $100 for first violations of the act. Subsequent offenses are punishable by fines ranging as high as $200.

LEADER THEATER REFURNISHED AND BRIGHTENED.

Beautiful paintings of reigning screen favorites and a $15,000 Kimball organ will add the finishing touches which will make the Leader one of the most beautiful moving picture theaters in the whole United States. To quote Mr. Effinger's words: "I am giving West Philadelphia a theater to be proud of, second to none in comfort and service, and in keeping with the name of Leader."

Union Men Do Not Patronize Them. Union Sympathizers Should Not."

These exhibitions will be continued until all of the school children in the vicinity have had a chance to see the pictures. "THE PIRATES" FILMED.

Honus Wagner, the grand old man of the national pastime, has at last been preserved for posterity—preserved on the film so that future generations may see the "Flying Dutchman" bat over 300. The moving picture camera operator followed the Pirates from Pittsburgh to Dawson Springs and thence to Hot Springs, where, in their training camp, he caught not only the bow-legged shortstop and hefty swatter, but the whole crew of them slugging the ball, running bases, catching, pitching and putting into practice all the other hocus-pocus that makes the national pastime the sport of the Southern American people.

Screen Club Elects

San Francisco Screeners Hold First Meeting in New Quarters in Tivoli Theater Building on April 8 and Elect Officers for Coming Year—Has Many Applications for Membership—Will Give Formal House Warming Soon.

By T. A. Church, San Francisco Correspondent of Moving Picture World.

THE SCREEN CLUB of San Francisco held its first meeting in the newly-furnished quarters in the Tivoli theater building, on Eddy street, on the evening of April 8th, and the new home was dedicated to fraternity and sociability in a manner that augurs well for the future of the organization. The formal opening will take place at a later date, when it is planned to give a dance and entertainment, but this will not be held until all of the furnishings are in place and the decoration of the club rooms is complete.

At the initial meeting many applications for membership were received and acted upon and the outlook is very bright for a heavy increase, now that permanent quarters have been secured. The matter of reducing the monthly dues to one dollar was discussed at this gathering and this step will probably be taken, it being the general belief that the membership would be more than doubled at once if this is done.

The election of officers resulted in the selection of the following: President, Sid Grauman, manager of Loew's Empress theater; vice-president, Charles Stillwell, with the Nat A. Magner Company; secretary, Ralph Marks, of the Acme theater, and treasurer, Joseph Huff, manager of the Unique and Odeon theaters. The board of directors selected to guide the club during the first year of its existence is composed of Sol Lesser, Tom North, Leon Boreis, N. K. Herzog, O. V. Traggardh, H. J. Gosliner and A. Goldberg.

A rising vote of thanks was given to the committee that labored so arduously to complete the furnishing of the club rooms in time for the initial gathering and for the excellent taste displayed in the selection of equipment. Following the business session refreshments were served and later in the evening Roscoe Arbuckle, Charles Chaplin and G. M. Anderson dropped in to assist in making the opening a memorable one.

MASTER PICTURES POPULAR.

The Mutual Film Corporation is introducing its new master-pictures in the San Francisco territory, and the early bookings have been heavy. The experiment has been tried of showing these at private exhibitions in the finest theaters after the regular performances, before invited guests, and this has proved very successful. The newly remodeled Strand at Sacramento was recently secured for a showing of "The Outcast" after the evening performances. Invitations were issued to Governor Johnson, members of the state legislature, city officials, newspaper men, men prominent in public life and to all moving picture exhibitors located within a radius of fifty miles. Fully six hundred persons accepted the invitations, including the governor, and the production was given a wonderful reception. This subject, together with "The Devil," was presented in a similar manner at the Broadway at Chico, where exhibitors and prominent men from the cities of Northern California gathered as guests of the Mutual Film Corporation. The success of these private showings has brought forcibly to the attention of film men the advantages of presenting feature attractions to exhibitors in the finest theaters that can be secured and with the theater atmosphere.

Re-Censors "The Nigger"

Ohio State Board of Censorship Reconsiders Fox Picture After Mayor Spiegel of Cincinnati Calls Its Attention to Certain Objectional Parts of It—Had Been Running Ten Days Before Protest Came.

By Kenneth C. Crain, Cincinnati Correspondent of Moving Picture World.

MUNICIPAL censorship has again made itself felt in Cincinnati; and, by a curious coincidence, Charles Weigel's Alhambra theater, on Fifth street, was again the victim, as in the former case, where "Three Weeks" was the film objected to. In this case it was "The Nigger," the film adaptation of the successful Sheldon play of that name, in which William Farnum was featured. The film was handled here by A. M. Muller, manager of the Fox Film Co. It seems, from all that can be gathered of the matter that Mayor Spiegel, whose fiat was responsible for this, as for the former order of withdrawal, had received numerous protests from various sources about the play, some of these being from negroes themselves, who, like those in Boston, objected to the use of the colloquial designation of their race, and some from people who believed that the play itself handled the racial question in an objectionable manner. Mr. Muller, as soon as he was notified of the order of withdrawal, which was issued last Wednesday, and which was promptly obeyed, as a matter of course, by Manager Weigel, got in touch with the State Board of Censorship, for the purpose of having the film re-submitted, and expects to trim down such parts as are considered objectionable, with the aid and advice of the State Board. This body, of course, had already approved the picture, but will censor it again, in the light of the objections of the local authorities, and endeavor to fit it to their views. A peculiar feature of this latest outburst is that the film had been shown in the city for ten days without any sign of objection on the part of the authorities, although this may be explained by the suggestion that the objections arose after many people had seen it, and that the action of the mayor was due to the cumulative effect of the "kicks" received. It is even proposed to change the name of the picture, "The New Governor" being the name adopted by the Fox Company to satisfy those who do not like the "Nigger."

FIGHT-FILMS MIGHT BE SHOWN IN OHIO

Prize Fights Are Unlawful; But Films of Them Probably Lawful.

In refreshing contrast to the stringent method in which objections to some films have been evidenced by local authorities, and to the objections themselves, Safety Director Holmes, of Cincinnati, announced recently, following the discussion of whether it would be possible to show pictures of the world's championship contest in this country, that he would interpose no objections if the question arose here. The view of Safety Director Benesch, of Cleveland, who takes the view that the pictures should not be allowed to be exhibited in Ohio on the ground that it is criminal to conduct a prize-fight in the state, and that therefore pictures of such a contest are equally criminal, is not taken by Mr. Holmes, who expressed himself on the subject as follows: "These pictures represent an event that has taken place upon foreign territory, and consequently their exhibition in this city cannot be construed as being in violation of the State law. It is unlawful to discharge firearms in the public streets of this city, but would any one say that because of this it is unlawful to reproduce in motion pictures a scene of the battles now in progress in Europe? So far no application for a permit has been made, but I can see no reason why it should be refused if properly made."

"THE HEART PUNCH."

The Colonial, Manager Ed. Bernhardi's theater on Fifth street, participated substantially in the "killing" made by the people who took a chance, and built a film around Jess Willard's training stunts for use in case he won the championship; and, as it seems, other theaters using the picture, which is labeled "The Heart Punch," will do equally well with it, in view of the apparent impossibility of getting the fight pictures themselves into the United States. "Nineteen Thousand Six Hundred and Twenty-Nine People Have Seen Jess Willard in 'The Heart Punch' in the past three days at the Colonial. Have You?" This is the way the Colonial advertised the success of the picture on last Wednesday, by big signs outside and by liberal space in the newspapers. As a matter of fact, the house has been crowded from opening to closing time, and the record for the full week's business, during all of which time this picture will be shown, will undoubtedly stand for a long time at the Colonial. Prices were not raised for the film, although it now seems that they might have been very well, judging by the attendance; but Manager Bernhardi preferred to stick to the ten-cent level, and thus permit all of his patrons to see the picture without more than the usual expenditure.

MAY LOCATE AT ST. THOMAS.

The latest report regarding the location of the Highland Film Corporation, which has for the past month or so been seeking a favorable site for its operations in the vicinity of Cincinnati, is that Ft. Thomas, which was originally settled upon as being the most suitable, has been finally selected. The Lagoon, the Kentucky summer amusement resort which was favored lately, has been turned down, it is understood, on account of the high price asked by its owners. Ample acreage at Ft. Thomas is available, and its location among the rugged Kentucky hills, overlooking the Ohio, is considered ideal for the purpose of making moving pictures.

HIPPODROME AT NEWPORT OPENS.

The Hippodrome, I. Frankel's new Newport theater, which is claimed to be the largest exclusive moving picture house in the Bluegrass State, was formally opened last week with immense success, three thousand persons standing in line to get tickets for the initial performance. In spite of the great seating capacity, 2,000 on the ground floor, the seating arrangements are so clever that every person in the house can see the screen without difficulty, and despite the distance of the rearmost seats from the screen the objects projected are perfectly clear. This is due largely to the care used in the selection of the screen, the first-class machines used and to the skill of the operators, who realize their responsibilities fully. A $10,000 unit Wurlitzer orchestra has been installed, completing the equipment of the house, and making it equal in every respect to any in the country. An unfortunate accident somewhat marred the satisfaction of Mr. Frankel in the success of the opening week, Clarence McCormick, who manages the house and others for him, falling at the theater and breaking his leg while trying to adjust a window. He was removed to his home for medical attention, and is resting easily.

CINCINNATI BRIEFS.

Manager E. P. Bernhardi, of the Colonial theater, has ordered a ten-thousand-dollar pipe organ, with chimes, bells and other attachments which will make the instrument more than equivalent to a full orchestra. It will be under full control by the organist, who will be able to operate all of the attachments from the keyboard.

The improvements promised at the Alhambra are already under way, and, in part, completed, the change of the entrance from the right side to the center having been finished last week. Changes in the electric lighting have also been made with beneficial results, while plans are under way for considerably enlarging the seating capacity, in connection with which the decorations will probably be gone over. Manager Weigel is immensely pleased with the consistently good business which the house is doing, in line with its past record, and looks forward with undiminished enthusiasm to the summer season.

The Coliseum theater, at 403 East Pearl street, ran afoul of Building Commissioner Rendigs last week, the Commissioner ordering the house closed on account of a defective operating booth. The house is owned by the Broadway Amusement Co.

PICTURES HELP ATLANTA CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

Are Aiding "Clean-Up" Call—No Better Advertising Than Screen.

By A. M. Beatty, Atlanta Correspondent of Moving Picture World.

ATLANTA is to be a "Spotless Town" as a result of the "clean up" campaign inaugurated by the Chamber of Commerce and other organizations of the city.

In order to do this each moving picture theater in the city is flashing on the screen the following:

"Clean up, Paint up."

"Make Atlanta the City Beautiful."

"Do it to-day."

The Atlanta Chamber of Commerce called the pictures to their help, claiming no better advertising medium existed in business life to-day than the moving picture theater, with the possible exception of the daily paper.

QUITMAN, GA., FARM AND CATTLE PARADE FILMED.

Arrangements are now being made by Secretary Clarke, of the Brooks County, Georgia, Industrial Club, for the taking of 2,000 feet of moving pictures of the parade of the animal industry convention to be held in Quitman, Ga., May 25. This year the farmers of Brooks County alone will have 500 farm floats illustrating all phases of diversified farming. Blooded cattle will be in the parade and a part of the moving picture.

ATLANTA BRIEFS.

The Majestic, at Columbus, Ga., one of the best known vaudeville and moving picture houses of that city, has been closed for rent, the owner of the building, James A. Lewis, having sworn out a dispossessory warrant. Since the swearing out of the warrant several employees of the theater have taken out attachments and labor liens. The Majestic theater was conducting a contest which closed Saturday night, April 10, the capital prize being an automobile. The theater management did not complete the payments on the car and it was taken back by the automobile people under the terms of the bill of sale. The theater owes various local bills also.

William Oldknow, who was the guest of Carl Laemmle on the special train to the opening of the Universal City, Cal., has returned to Atlanta. "This trip," said Mr. Oldknow, "was the most enjoyable and wonderful of any I have ever taken; it was the trip of a life time. I have never in my life seen anything like the luxury of our special train; everything the heart might wish for was on this train. Universal City surpasses anything I have ever seen in its completeness. It is the greatest marvel as a picture producing plant in the world. I spent several days there, and was never more royally entertained in my life than by the Universal moving picture stars. They are the most likable set of people it has ever been my pleasure to meet."

Theda Bara, who created the "vampire" role in moving pictures, will pose in Atlanta in a very short while. The company with which she is now playing is making Western pictures at Dahlonega, Ga., using the old gold mines as the setting for one of Roy Norton's books done into a picture. From Dahlonega they will come to Atlanta, but the exact date is not known when they will be here.

R. V. Anderson, formerly manager in Atlanta for the General Film Co., is now associated with the North American Film Corporation as Atlanta representative for the Southern states.

Percy L. Smith, who for some time has represented the Paramount in this territory as road man, has resigned his position with that company and has accepted the management of the Empire theater, in Montgomery, Ala.

"Husband or Lover," the five-reeler recently finished by the Hesser Motion Picture Corporation, an Atlanta concern, will be shown at the Montgomery theater April 19 and 20.

The Grand theater management has just completed arrangements for the exclusive first run releases of Paramount, World Film, Fox and the Alliance programs. The Grand is doing a remarkable business under the new management, the Wells interests.

The Daily Journal Belgian war pictures of four reels are drawing great crowds at the Lyric.

MICHIGAN NOTES OF INTEREST.

Special to Moving Picture World from Midwest News Service.

MANAGER C. S. SULLIVAN of the Royal and Grand theaters at Escanaba has started a suit for damages against the Broadway Feature Film Company of Detroit, the papers being served upon the latter's representative, R. S. Bendell, in Escanaba. The suit is based upon the failure of the company to ship the film, "Cabiria," for exhibition as advertised by the plaintiff. It is alleged in the declaration that Mr. Sullivan was greatly inconvenienced and put to large expense in the way of advertising.

Jesse R. Seargeant of Bay City has taken over the Gem at Hillsdale, which was operated by Beck & Gardner until it was visited by a disastrous fire.

Against Federal Censorship

Chairwoman of Drama Committee of Minnesota Federation of Women's Clubs Endorses National Board of Censorship—There Seems to Be Open-Mindedness in the Middle West and Willingness to Get the Truth Before Agitating.

By F. H. Madison, Minneapolis Correspondent of Moving Picture World.

IT IS just about as feasible to talk of federal censorship of newspapers, books and art as it is of motion picture films, declares Mrs. Charles W. Cartwright, Minneapolis, chairman of the Drama Committee of the General Federation of Women's Clubs. She voiced this opinion upon her return from spending some time studying the National Board. The integrity of that board is unassailable she believes and is also convinced that no paid board can ever handle censorship satisfactorily.

"I do not say that it is the best thing that can be for censoring motion pictures, but I do believe it is the best thing that exists," she said. "It tries to reflect public opinion in judging pictures and to eliminate what might be baneful or vicious in its influence. The producers need public opinion with them and the producers of 95 per cent. of the films shown in this country are co-operating with the National Board of Censorship. The judgment of the board must necessarily be very broad and liberal. It must pass things which at times some communities would not approve, but which public opinion would not on the whole condemn. Every city should have its own volunteer committee to supplement for each community the work done by the National Board, I believe."

Mrs. Cartwright considered "The Nigger" objectionable.

REGULATIONS ON STORING FILM.

Minneapolis Has New Film Storage Requirements—Penalties for Infractions.

The Minneapolis city council has passed a film storage ordinance effective July 1. The law forbids having films in quantities of ten and upwards, except the same be kept in separate metallic boxes in a fireproof brick or concrete vault of not less than 8 inches in thickness. The vault shall not exceed 1,000 cubic feet internal contents and be well ventilated to the outside air. It shall have only one door or entrance, shall contain only fireproof shelves and furniture and shall be constructed and maintained only on the top floor of the building it occupies, unless the entire building is of fireproof construction. No moving picture film shall be kept stored in any building occupied or used for lodging or housekeeping purposes. The part of the building used for storage of films shall be lighted by electricity. All electric wiring shall be inclosed in pipe conduits approved by the Inspector of Buildings. The lamps shall be fitted with keyless sockets and double vapor-proof globes. All switches must be outside of the room or vault where the films are stored or handled. All that portion of the building so used for storage and handling of films and the space occupied by the vaults as hereinbefore provided shall be equipped throughout with approved automatic sprinkler system. No smoking shall be allowed in or about the building or vaults in which films are stored. Clippings from films and waste paper shall be kept in self-closing metallic cans. Penalty is a fine of not more than $100 or not more than 90 days in jail.

MAYOR BANS THREE PICTURES.

After two private exhibitions at the Strand, Mayor Nye, of Minneapolis, canned "The Hypocrites." The two exhibitions were brought about by the customary controversy as to the propriety of the exhibition of "The Naked Truth" scene. Club women, mothers of children, could see nothing objectionable in the picture, but clergymen, Catholic and Protestant alike, protested. The Mayor played safe and canned it. "Three Weeks" and "The Nigger" also were forbidden.

MINNESOTA BRIEFS.

SALT LAKE CITY LETTER.

By H. W. Pickering, Salt Lake Correspondent of Moving Picture World.

THE following directors were elected to the control of affairs of the Rex Theater Company, of Provo, Utah, which operates the Princess theater, in that city, at the annual election last Saturday: A. L. Stallings, Thomas Ashton, G. C. Lindsay, Alva Nelson and Mrs. Tacy Stallings. The board elected A. L. Stallings president, Thomas Ashton vice-president and G. C. Lindsay secretary and treasurer. John B. Ashton, of the Rex Company, resigned as manager of the Princess theater in order to devote his entire time to the management of the Columbia theater in Provo. Mr. Stallings, it is understood, will be managing director of the Princess. He is an experienced motion picture man and formerly operated houses in Springville and other southern Utah towns.

A temporary arrangement, which may become permanent, has been made for motion pictures four days of the week at Loew's Empress theater in Salt Lake. This arrangement will begin Monday, April 12.

"A Fool There Was," the Fox feature booked for a return engagement in Salt Lake at the Liberty theater, has stirred up a bit of criticism among women of the city, which has been formally put in the form of a comparatively mild protest to the city commissioners against allowing the run of the production. Chief of Police B. F. Grant, ex-officio censor, will see a trial run of the production before the opening date. "A Fool There Was" played with great success two days at the American theater several weeks ago.

Illinois Race-Hatred Bills

Measure to Prohibit Pictures That Will Incite Race Hatred Amended and Will Penalize by Heavy Fine All Who in Any Way Further Such—The Informer Will, If the Ryan Bill Passes, Get Half the Fine.

By Frank H. Madison, Illinois Correspondent of Moving Picture World.

AMENDMENTS have been adopted which modify somewhat the Jackson bill before the Illinois Legislature and still allow it to accomplish its object "to prohibit acts tending to incite race riot or race hatred." As revised, any corporation, person or combination of persons who shall advertise, publish, present, exhibit or cause to be advertised, published, presented or exhibited in any public place in Illinois any lithograph, drawing, picture, play, drama or sketch that tends to incite race riot or race hatred or that shall represent or purport to represent any hanging, lynching or burning of any human being, incited by race hatred, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be fined not less than $200 nor more than $1,000 for each offense.

Immoral and also defamatory moving pictures are hit in F. J. Ryan's house bill to revise the law in relation to criminal jurisprudence. As revised section 223 will provide:

"Whosoever brings or causes to be brought into this state for sale or exhibition or shall sell or offer to sell or shall give away or offer to give away any obscene and indecent, scurrilous or defamatory stereoptic or moving picture or any stereoscopic picture or moving picture or film containing, presenting or representing anything of a defamatory nature tending to blacken the memory of the dead or to impeach the honesty, integrity, virtue or reputation of any living person, class or body of persons or of any sect, creed or nationality not existing in violation of the constitution or laws, thereby tending to expose him or them to public hatred, contempt, ridicule or financial injury, or shall advertise the same for sale or give information as to where such defamatory pictures may be obtained, may be fined not less than $100 nor more than $1,000. The informer gets one-half the fine.

LEAH BAIRD IN ILLINOIS.

Illinois photo-play lovers are pleased for many reasons that Leah Baird should be the first representative of the Vitagraph Company to appear in person before them. Special enjoyment is found in the fact that selection should have been made of a star who has played remembered roles in so many productions that were satisfying to those who are lovers of art and who are intolerant of cheap romance in photo-plays. It is these character portrayals that have made her a favorite. Aside from her beauty, so emphatic in the widely distributed "Neptune's Daughter," half a dozen Illinois towns lay proud claim to her as a former resident. Among the leading houses where Miss Baird appeared were the Gaiety, at Springfield; Apollo, at Peoria; Scenic, at Bloomington, and Star, at Lincoln.

CATERING TO LOCAL FEELING.

Balmy spring nights have caused Illinois managers to bestir themselves to prepare programs which will offset the theatergoers' plea, "It is too nice to be indoors." Ray Schalk, of the White Sox, is a Litchfield boy, so the pictures of the world baseball tour made a hit at the Grand, in Litchfield. Films of a busy Saturday-after in a live country town are interesting to the people themselves and, Manager Poff of the Lyric, at Gibson City, got a camera man to work. The Lyric, at Winchester, had a fireman's night. When the Princess, at Joliet, showed "The Commanding Officer," much capital was made of the fact that Alice Dovey was a Joliet girl. Big league ball pictures and local films were on the Washington's program to help the Commercial Club, at Belleville, equip its ball team. A special Pythian film show is booked for the Wildey, at Edwardsville, on May 19, when the K. of P. of the district are in convention. The Wildey recently ran a fire prevention film for local brickmakers for three days. The Canton Register, a paper whose ventures in the photo-play field have been numerous, brought "Neptune's Daughter" to the Princess, at Canton, showing it at 10, 15 and 25 cents. The stunt of showing slides taken about the city was so successful that the Barrison, at Waukegan, repeated it after a few weeks. The Home theater, at Mattoon, had a benefit for the Catholic school. Erlier's theater, in East St. Louis, is giving tango racers to the youngsters. Rev. Geo. Long, a local clergyman, lectured "From the Manger to the Cross" at Dreamland, in Warsaw.

ILLINOIS BRIEF NOTES.

Anti-liquor people of Lebanon, in Southern Illinois, used motion pictures—"John Barleycorn" and other films—in their campaign to have the city voted dry.

Joliet may take the initial step in using moving pictures in the mammoth Illinois statehood centennial celebration in 1918. School children of that city produced a pageant of Illinois history and the Ad Club or Commercial Club may have it repeated and a film made.

Mayor J. T. Bidinger would not let "Three Weeks" be shown in Waukegan.

Manager Ackerman is enlarging, reseating, redecorating and putting a new front in the Capital at Mason City.

Six reels for 5 and 10 cents will be the policy of Dr. L. G. Pullen's new theater at Havana, Wright & Dehm, managers. It has been christened The Langford, as a tribute to the owner's mother.

The Elite has pleaded to the city council at Galesburg for a smaller license, as it seats few and the war tax also is burdensome.

Bennett Brothers will open a new picture show at Chillicothe about May 1.

"You wouldn't know the place" gives an idea of the extensive changes the Gages have made to the Royal at Sandwich. The seating capacity has been increased.

The latest activities of Delmar Schnepp, manager of the Chatterton, and Manager Lyons, of the Castle, at Bloomington, are to go scouting for a site for a new picture house in that city. The old Castle is being repaired and the picture shows are running at the Chatterton, but will have to give way to theatrical attractions in September.

Manager Burnstine has reopened the Star, at Lincoln, after expending $8,000 to make it a thoroughly modern picture house.

"The Spoilers" went back to the New Star at Clinton April 17.

The La Petite, Court, Princess and Royal picture houses at Kankakee have asked the city for a new license basis. They believe they should pay less than the vaudeville houses.

Two five-cent or "popular price" nights are left open each week in the new policy of the Majestic, at Paris. Paramount, Kline and Celebrated Players service will be used the rest of the time at ten cents.

The High School at Lewistown has purchased a picture machine.

The Village theater, at Wilmette, which has been in the hands of the decorators, has been reopened.

C. L. Bishop, of Piper City, has purchased the Lyric, at Remington, Ind., from C. F. Alter.

Manager Rubens, of the Lincoln, at Joliet, has installed a new Bartola.

The new Princess, at White Hall, will be completed about July 1.

E. H. Harris, who formerly conducted a show at Warsaw, was killed by a train at Monmouth.

B. Stout and J. Kokas, of Victoria, have started a twice-a-week show at Viola.

Manager Hatcher is practically remodelling the photoplay at Elmwood, to be ready for a new policy of more features.

W. A. Peterson, of Bloomington, succeeds Raymond Schroeder as manager of the Colonial, at Galesburg. Schroeder was a live wire and only goes back to Joliet to become managing editor of the Joliet News.

EXCEL PHOTOPLAY COMPANY.

New San Antonio Company Hires Haddock to Produce Its Pictures.

By Special to Moving Picture World from Southwest News Service.

THE Excel Foto Company has been making plans for a 150x150 studio costing $25,000 at San Antonio, Tex. It is planned to produce one or two two-reel comedies a week with William Haddock, formerly with the Melies company, as director. William Blake and Carrie Harden will play leads. In addition the company will turn out four multiple reel features each year. Its products will be distributed from its own office in New York. Col. J. A. Robertson is president and M. E. Woodford vice-president and general manager.

The new venture thus starts out with a fine chance of doing really good film making. Mr. Haddock has proved his skill in many a first-class offering. He had the real direction of the All Star picture, "Paid in Full," and among the Melies releases for which he was responsible is that heart-warming classic, "Tony the Greaser." Old time picture fans will remember it as one of those delightfully romantic Western pictures that created the demand for "western stuff" which partly died out because there was so much of it made that it couldn't possibly be kept up to the originality and convincing naturalness that it had when producers made it with pleasure.

SUNDAY CHARGES DISMISSED IN HOT SPRINGS.

Cases against operators of moving picture shows in Hot Springs, Ark., charged with violating the Sunday laws were dismissed by the court.

The shows had been operating on Sundays for the benefit of the Moose lodge. No tickets were sold, but most spectators contributed ten cents each. Operators were Moose who donated their services. The Ministerial Alliance caused arrests and lost in the courts. When the grand jury met that body's attention was called to the Sunday shows. The sheriff and deputies, two weeks later, made about twenty-five arrests, but Justice Gladson dismissed all the cases.

IN THE SOUTHWEST.

A. H. Bender is now sole owner of the Imp at Cleveland, Okla., having purchased the interest of Lee Lunsford.

A. Pye has opened his new Queen at Smithville, Tex., a picture house. He will add vaudeville next fall.

J. W. Pittman has leased a building on Procter street in Port Arthur, Tex., for use as a moving picture show.

R. L. Moore will build a new opera house at Vernon, Tex.

The Chamber of Commerce at Little Rock, Ark., has been conducting a scenario contest for a picture which will exploit that city.

The theater at Forest Park, Little Rock, Ark., which uses pictures, has been opened for the season.

Henry Gillespie has been making arrangements for a show at Faxon, Okla.

CONSOLIDATION OF PICTURE HOUSES IN HAWAII

One Company Practically Controls the Picture Business in the Islands.

Special to Moving Picture World from Pacific News Service.

THE Consolidated Amusement Company now has practically a monopoly on the show business in the Hawaiian Islands, having purchased the Hawaii theater and the interests of Sam Blair. Announcement of the deal included:

"Under the new order of theatrical things, the Consolidated Amusement Company will operate the Bijou, Liberty, Empire and Hawaii theaters. The Paramount pictures, purchased from Blair, will be shown at the Popular theater for an indefinite period. Henry Bredhoff will continue as manager. C. A. Pedric will be house manager of the Liberty, and Mae McKay Scharlin will remain as manager of the Hawaii. The Bijou and Empire will be managed from the head office of the Consolidated Company.

"Aside from the theaters on Oahu, the Consolidated Company now controls the Valley Isle theater, at Wailuku, the Lyceum, at Kahului, the Pioneer, at Lahaina and the Empire and Moeau, at Hilo, and will furnish attractions for the Fourth Cavalry, Cavalry and Artillery, First Infantry, Twenty-fifth Infantry, Fort Kamehameha, and Fort Shafter playhouses. Plans are about completed also for the erection of a new theater at Lihue on Kauai."

SUNDAY OPENING IN HAWAII.

A broad-minded attitude toward Sunday picture shows was shown in the health and police committee's report to the legislature in recommending the passage of Representative-Exhibitor Fernandez's bill allowing such shows. The report said in part: "Your committee feels from the nature of the entertainment set forth in the bill, namely, of the scenic, educational or biblical character, is beneficial to a community, and more especially to Hawaii. It would be the means of keeping certain young men from indulging in card playing, visiting blind pigs and other amusements not fit for the young people of our country to indulge in. Your committee finds that a quiet moving picture show of the nature named within the bill is far less of a violation of the Sabbath than baseball and work allowed by law."

The lower house passed the bill 20 to 9 after it killed an amendment to have one-half of the seats free to the public. An amendment limiting the shows to afternoon and evening carried.

HAWAII BRIEFS.

Japanese agitation against 'The Typhoon" made for big business when the popular in Honolulu played a return date of that film.

Films of the Ritchie-Rivers fight were shown at the Bijou in Honolulu, then started on a tour of the military posts and the other islands.

Ye Liberty theater in Honolulu has reduced its prices for big features to ten, twenty and thirty cents.

A new curfew bill introduced into the legislature at Honolulu provides that theaters shall lose their license when found guilty of allowing children under 15 in their places after 8 p. m. without escort or adequate explanation.

Moving pictures and slides are being used in Hawaii for educational purposes. Dr. An N. Sinclair of the Board of Health showed anti-tuberculosis films at the Y M. C. A. The Harvard men in Hawaii were hosts to the Yale men at the University Club in Honolulu and exhibited films of the last Harvard-Yale foot ball game. The college of Hawaii is using illustrated lectures on landscape gardening. It is proposed to equip the library in Honolulu with a projection outfit.

Featuring Its Naughtiness

Some Exhibitors Inclined in Advertising to Make the Most of Suggestive Component of Certain Films—It Is One Cause of Inimical Agitation—Prudish Censorship Furnishes Many a Promise of Puriency to Help a Poor Picture.

By Frank H. Madison, Northwest Correspondent of Moving Picture World.

THE inclination to advertise a picture as being what is generally termed naughty still prevails and is causing some of the censorship agitation. It is seldom that a manager "gets away with it."

An unprejudiced weekly in Tacoma, Wash., objects to this kind of publicity for "The Kreutzer Sonata" and presents the house unfavorably as follows:

"Some prudes in Portland censored the film there, although no other city in the country saw anything particularly objectionable in it. But because Portland officially blue-penciled it the Tacoma picture house played it up. 'It was too bad for Portland; come on and see it,' was the idea, if not the language used. It may have caught some people. If it did and they expected to see anything shocking they were disappointed. The film was advertised as costing the management of the Tacoma play house $1,000 for the week. The management of the Seattle house, where it was presented last week, told the writer that it cost him $500. When the Tacoma manager paid $1,000 for it he seems to have made a poor bargain. 'What is there to the show?' the Seattle manager was asked. 'Nothing except that a child is born out of wedlock.' So there you are."

The same evil is hit by a Woman's Club report in Galesburg, Ill. "One of the picture men advertised a picture saying children were positively not admitted. We pointed out to him that a picture which is unfit for little children is unfit for young people of the high school age. He said it was for advertisement purposes the children were mentioned."

Rev. Walter B. Reed has purchased a picture show at Sheridan, Wyoming, and will make a living in that manner, it is said, while a church row is being fought.

A resolution was adopted by the trustees of the Christian Church, of which he was pastor, calling for his removal. Declaring he had a year's contract, he refused to quit, and the trustees secured an injunction restraining him from entering the church or holding services in the name of the church. Then he announced his intention of fighting the case to a finish and entered the photoplay field.

The Schaefer Opera house, at Grundy Center, has been reopened and will give pictures Friday and Saturday nights.

A. M. Beardsley will play pictures, vaudeville and stock in a new airdome he is having erected at Shenandoah.

O. Sherwood, of Shellrock, has opened a new picture house at Osceola, making two theaters for that place.

John Q. Page, of the Page Drug Company, at La Porte City, who bought the Cozy, re-equipped it, including new screen and orchestra, added more seats and renamed it the Pastime.

WISCONSIN NEWS LETTER.

By Midwest Special Moving Picture World Service.

A DETERMINED movement at the next meeting of the Fourth Wisconsin District of Federated Women's Clubs to secure women censors of moving pictures was forecasted by Mrs. William C. Kroening, a Milwaukee club women. "Men do not amount to much as censors of films," she is quoted. "If women had the censoring of the films many things recently seen in the city could not have passed."

At a meeting of the Women's Clubs of Superior, it was announced the General Federation of Woman's Clubs were urging that member clubs consult the leaflets, "Federated Clubs and the Movies," which set forth the methods for improving conditions in the photoplay business.

The Peoples theater at Superior is being enlarged to seat several hundred more patrons.

Pictures of home folks filled the Monroe at Monroe.

The multiple reel feature has made its debut at the Majestic and Pearl theaters in De Pere. Manager John Speaker started this radical change with "After the Ball" and "The Stain."

The Allen hall at Livingston is being remodeled into a moving picture house. Construction of the new Palace at Antigo will begin early in May.

I. S. Siedders sold the Electric theater at Lodi to Patterson & Fallenstein.

Detroit Prosperous

Picture Business Satisfactory in Automobile City—Everyone Who Can Do Anything Is Busy and Making Good Wages—Thousands of Photoplay Patrons Can Afford to See the Best Shows and Managers Are All Smiling With Contentment.

By Jacob Smith, Detroit Correspondent of Moving Picture World.

BUSINESS in Detroit at the present time with the moving picture theaters is really very good. There never was a time when one could hear such favorable expressions about business conditions. No one seems to be finding any fault, and everybody seems well satisfied. It is a fact that industrially Detroit was never more prosperous. Every factory in the city is operating to capacity and this takes in the large and small ones. In the automobile industry, most of the plants are working day and night to get out the orders. The demand for skilled labor is unprecedented. In fact, skilled labor in Detroit is so scarce that local factories are advertising in other cities for help. Every skilled workman who wants a job can get it and at the highest wage. Every factory has more orders than it can possibly fill. The outlook for the balance of the spring and the summer is exceedingly bright, and this means that Detroit will continue to taste prosperity for a long while to come. We have one motor car factory alone that employs 20,000 men and is making 1,850 machines per day and shipping them the same day. Many big orders have been placed here for goods to be sent to the warring countries.

SAM ABRAMS IN DETROIT.

Sam Abrams, publicity representative for the Eternal City, has been spending a few weeks in Detroit in connection with the exhibition of this wonderful film at the Washington. Mr. Abrams did some very effective work during his stay in Detroit getting across some very good stories in the local newspapers.

FIRE MARSHAL ON DRUNKARDS.

In the latest bulletin issued by the State Fire Marshal's office at Lansing, Mich., is contained the following paragraph: "Reports have been received by the State Fire Marshal's Bureau that a recent fire in a theater located in one of the smaller Michigan towns was caused by the carelessness of the operator who went on duty in an intoxicated condition. Local authorities should take precautions that the operators in their towns do not attempt to work while drunk. It requires a sober man to operate a moving picture machine or disaster is apt to follow."

THREE NEW THEATERS.

Theaters nearing completion are the Lakewood theater, in Fairview, the one at Chene street near Milwaukee avenue for the Monroe Theater Company, and the new Norwood, at Woodward and the Boulevard.

GLOBE COMPANY INCORPORATES.

The Globe Amusement Company, operating the Globe theater, at Grand River avenue, near Trumbull, has incorporated for $100,000. The principal stockholders are Leroy Bishop, Herman A. Loiffler and Alvin D. Hersch. It is understood that Mr. Bishop, manager of the theater, is considering having the theater enlarged The Globe, under his management, has proven a very successful enterprise.

JOHN WARD GOES TO GAYETY.

John M. Ward, formerly manager of the United Amusement Company, operating the Broadway, the Globe and a Windsor theater, has been appointed manager of the Gayety burlesque theater, Detroit. For the past year he has been manager of the Gayety theater in Buffalo.

BRITISH-AMERICAN COMPANY.

The British-American Feature Company, Victor J. Lorden, proprietor, has opened offices at 403 Peter Smith building.

BROADWAY-STRAND OPENS.

Detroit's New 1,000-Seat Theater Has Premier on April 10.

The Broadway-Strand, under new management, opened its doors to more than 1,000 invited guests Saturday evening, April 10. It was open to the public the next day. The Broadway-Strand is now a real theater and is the old Broadway in a new dress. But what a big change. This house, which has failed under divers other policies, will now be devoted to high-class motion pictures, and judging from the response accorded this plan of procedure the first week, there is little fear as to the future of this playhouse. The lobby of the theater has been remodeled for its new purposes, and the booth is downstairs on the main floor. It is decorated in gold, with mirrors on the outside, and few who pass by know that it is the operator's booth. The spacious auditorium has also been redecorated throughout. The whole theater is done in soft tones, pleasing to the sight and imparting a sense of rest and comfort. A duplex pipe organ of exquisite tone has been installed, although it was not in readiness the opening week. Pretentious fresco paintings decorate the side and ceiling panels. The ushers are garbed in red and blue uniforms. The orchestra occupies the stage, upon which there is an elaborate setting. The entire front of the building has been changed, and there is also a new entrance into the balcony, making the climb much easier than it formerly was. The Broadway-Strand is under the management of Harry I. Garson, formerly of New York. The house manager is Edward T. Butcher, also of New York. The opening attraction was "The Christian," while the second week attraction was "The New Governor," better known as "The Nigger." Mr. Garson is also at the head of the Broadway Feature Film Company, which makes its headquarters in the Broadway-Strand building.

SUIT OVER A PICTURE.

The Broadway-Strand Theater Co., of Detroit, was granted an injunction in the Wayne circuit court April 15 preventing the Washington theater from showing a motion picture drama entitled "The Nigger." The court also ruled that the Fox Film corporation should deliver the film to the Broadway-Strand theater in time for showing it on April 18. The injunction was applied for by the Broadway-Strand after its contract with this "film deluxe" was cancelled by the Fox people, who later booked it with John H. Kunsky for the Washington. The Fox company, through A. Carlos, their special representative, claimed that the Broadway-Strand had openly violated its contract by booking another picture for the week of April 25, although its contract called for the purchase of Fox films for the period of one year. Harry I. Garson, of the Broadway-Strand, however denied this. The film was rented to Mr. Kunsky the day following the cancellation of the contract, so that Mr. Kunsky was acting innocently in the matter.

MILLER TO MANAGE FAMILY THEATER.

Jack J. Miller has been appointed manager of the Family theater, Detroit, succeeding Frank J. O'Donnell, who has returned to Grand Rapids. Mr. Miller was formerly manager of the Family theater in Cincinnati, which is operated by the Harris Amusement Company. Previously he was connected with the Bijou and Lubin's theater in Cincinnati.

Architect Joseph P. Jogerst is preparing the plans for an addition to the amusement building at 895 Junction avenue for Louis F. Wojcik; the addition will be 30 by 120 feet in size. Mr. Jogerst is also preparing plans for a brick and stile and steel theater to be erected at Dix and Ferdinand avenues, that will be 60 by 129 feet in size. The cost of this latter enterprise will be about $75,000; the theater will seat 1,000 people. Frederick A. Schneider is president of the company and William Steffes, secretary.

ORPHEUM A PICTURE HOUSE FOR SUMMER.

By G. D. Crain, Jr., Chattanooga Correspondent of Moving Picture World.

ROY SHELTON, vice-president and general manager of the Dixie Amusement Company, of Nashville, Tenn., has announced that his company will open the Orpheum as a motion picture house, on April 26. The company will promote a number of high class feature productions similar to those being shown at the Strand. It is believed that the Orpheum can be made into a very popular summer motion picture theater, as it has 1,200 seats and natural ventilation. An orchestra will be employed and only white people admitted to the theater. The bulk of the attractions shown will call for an admission price of 10 cents, but special features will call for a raise in price to 15 or 25 cents. The same company operates the Strand. The opening attraction at the Orpheum will be "The Clemenceau Case," a five-reel production of one of Alexander Dumas' stories.

E. D. MILLER FILMS PARADE.

Mr. Miller is a local man who recently took up camera work as a sideline, and he has already placed hundreds of feet of films with the news weeklies of the country. He covers the entire territory of Tennessee for progressive moving picture concerns, and was too live a wire to overlook the highway meeting. Sometimes Miller handles the telegraph key when there is nothing doing in the picture line.

TENNESSEE BRIEF NOTES.

At Memphis, Tenn., the Paragon Feature Film Company has completed 2,000 feet of film made for the Business Men's Club. It is understood that as soon as the film is developed it will be shown first at the Lyric theater. It is understood that arrangements have been made to show the film in 183 cities throughout Tennessee during the next few months.

If the plans of the promoters are carried out, Harriman, Tenn., will have a new opera house in which motion pictures may be shown from time to time. B. C. Watkins, E. B. Patton, N. D. Boecher, A. F. Watson and L. P. Geasland have purchased, for $3,000, a vacant lot on Roan street adjoining the Manufacturers' National Bank. The lot has a frontage of 44 feet and is 106 feet deep. An architect is now working on plans for the building which, according to a statement made by Mr. Watkins, will probably be a three-story brick. It is planned to have the theater on the first floor, offices on the second and lodge rooms on the third floor.

At Paris, Tenn., O. C. Jackson, manager and proprietor of the Dixie theater, has sold his interests to parties who will organize a corporation to operate the theater. It is understood that the purchasers are also interested in the Princess theater of the same city.

Harry Vaughn Catlin, of Chattanooga, Tenn., has leased a building in the Butler block on Roan street, and expects to remodel it and equip a first class motion picture theater.

David Hargan, of the Essanay Film Manufacturing Company, has relieved Harry Zech as photographer at the company's studio on Signal Mountain, at Chattanooga, Tenn. Mr. Hargan recently returned from a trip to Africa by way of the company's London office. Mr. Zech will be away from Chattanooga for a few weeks, but will return about the first of the summer.

At Knoxville, Tenn., arrangements have been made whereby special pictures for children will be shown every Saturday morning at the Queen theater. George N. Shorey, manager, has just returned from a trip to the East, where he arranged with film manufacturers for a number of special pictures.

MARS' THEATER MADE BIGGER.

Special to Moving Picture World from Trades News, New Orleans.

MARS' theater, opposite the St. Roch playground, New Orleans, is being enlarged from six hundred to one thousand capacity. It will be generally remodelled and improved at the same time, making it one of the best suburban houses in town. As it stands it is one of the best, as far as the character of the pictures go, and there is vaudeville, too. The screen is the especial pride of G. B. Mars, one of the owners, his brother, P. L. Mars, artist of some local note, having arranged it for him. The curtains and drops used for the vaudeville and occasional drama are good, but the screen is unusual; a dead black border surrounds the white ground on which the pictures are shown, the white space being just the size of the picture. This arrangement shows the pictures off to excellent advantage.

GULF STATES SHORT NOTES.

The "Louisiana," Baton Rouge picture house, recently showed "Cabiria," feature picture, for which Fichtenberg holds the Southern rights, for two days, and at 50 cents admission. It was the first time that Baton Rouge had been asked to dig up fifty cents for a picture, but there was no complaint at the price, on the other hand the houses for the two days were even above par.

The Fox Film Corporation's "Wormwood" company, working in New Orleans under the direction of Marshall Farnum, were the guests of J. E. Pearce, Southern manager of the Pearce interests, the other night at a private view of "The Valley of the Missing" and "Kreutzer Sonata," Fox productions in the projection room of the "Trianon." Several exchange men, among them W. T. Stephens, New Orleans manager for Fox, were also present. Both the pictures have been booked for Pearce's "Tudor," now an all-feature house and of late charging 25 cents admission.

Pathe has booked "Who Pays?" to Pearce's Trianon. This is the first release of the Balboa series pictures. The New Orleans exchange reports business excellent, much improved with the end of Lent and the general Spring feeling.

Pathe and the Associated-Pickwick filmed "Texas," the new strong man last week while he put on some of his stunts in front of the Times-Picayune. He is being booked as the gentlemanly gorilla and he does some remarkable feats of strength.

A. C. Brown, owner and manager of the Seminole theater, Bay St. Louis, Miss., is coming in for a good deal of praise for his presence of mind, due to his success in emptying his theater when it burned one night last week.

Union for Efficiency

Ottawa Moving Picture Operators Adopt Several Intelligent Regulations of Great Help to Themselves and Employers—Will Increase the Influence of Unionism—Shows Democratic Spirit at Its Best.

By Carl J. Ketchum, Ottawa Correspondent of Moving Picture World.

TO be thoroughly up to date and make for competence in every respect, was the reason adduced, at a meeting of the Ottawa Moving Picture Operators this week, and for laying down certain regulations which will in future govern the work of local operators. The first decision reached in the direction of carrying out the plan of the union was that a clean-up day be part of the week's work. This day was fixed for Monday when operators must dissect and clean up the working parts of their machines thoroughly. This will not only benefit the owners of the machine but will have the result of making clearer and better pictures for the thousands of patrons in the city.

That, hereafter, in all houses where the motor propeller is used, the first picture of each day must be crank propelled, was another important decision reached at the meeting. This action was taken in order that operators may be given an opportunity to catch any flaws and prevent damage through same to the machine. Failure to comply with these two laws of the union will make individuals responsible and answerable for their neglect, when penalties will follow.

In answer to several queries, President W. Hay assured the operators that the new regulations covering the province of Ontario were now in the hands of the printer and copies would be shortly furnished. There have been some amendments to the regulations and one clause provides that a licensed operator is not required to operate a dissolver or lantern silde machine. The regulations also demand that an applicant for a moving picture operator's license must first serve an apprenticeship unless he can show that he has operated in some other country or province for a period of at least six months.

To the local union belongs the distinction of being the first organization to elect delegates to the labor representation committee. The choice of delegates was left in the hands of President Hay who selected Messrs. P. Kahayes, E. Andrews and E. Beaucage as the representatives. The business agent, Mr. J. Thibeault, reported that all houses in the city were now in union hands and every member was at work. The examining board composed of Messrs. C. Ross, W. Hays, F. L. Montreuil, Emmanuel Gravelle and P. Kahayes reported favorably on the two new applicants, John Alexander and C. Mulvenie, to whom the oath of membership has been administered. A notice of motion was given by Mr. C. Ross that at the next meeting a change in local by-laws making the initiation fee $25, instead of $15, as at present.

OTTAWA SHORT NOTES.

Mr. Richard Schlesinger, special representative of the Wm. Thomas Co., of Montreal, and other prominent picture companies of New York and London, was in Ottawa this week. He is pushing some big moving picture advertising scheme which may be introduced in the Capital as the result of his talk with Manager Finlay, who controls the three biggest houses in the city.

Messrs. Harry Low and J. D. Murray, joint proprietors of St. George's theater, Bank street, announce that they intend to open up two new houses in the city shortly. They are not in a position yet to state the situation or cost of their proposed buildings.

The Flower theater is now running Broadway star features. The management is also showing exclusively the regular World Film Productions and this week is giving Kleine's Officer 666.

Ottawa houses may be affected by the burning out of the two big Toronto film concerns—the Universal Film Exchange and the Ramo Film Corporation. The loss to the Exchange is estimated at $125,000, partly covered by insurance, while the Ramo company suffers to the extent of $25,000.

REPEAL CHILD-SPECTATOR LAW.

New Law Merely Requires That Children Be Accompanied By Adult.

By David K. Billings, Ontario Correspondent of Moving Picture World.

THE law which prohibited children under fifteen from entering a moving picture theater unless accompanied by a "parent" or "guardian" or "adult member of the household" has been repealed by the Ontario legislature. This law has been a particular thorn in the sides of exhibitors, because it placed the responsibility of deciding whether a man or woman was really the guardian or member of the household upon the manager of the theater. While is was not enforced until during the last year several convictions are on record against managers who were deceived by people leading them to believe they were legal guardians of the children. While the object of the law was quite worthy it was absolutely unworkable and unfair.

The new law simply requires that children under 15 be accompanied by an "adult," which is going back to the old law previously in force. Much of the need of the law has disappeared because theaters are no longer allowed to be kept in absolute darkness.

LIMITS TAXING OF THEATERS.

Another bouquet has been handed theater managers by the Ontario legislature that seems to imply a feeling on the part of the ligislators that the moving picture industry has been over taxed and over regulated. No municipality may now charge a higher annual tax, or license fee to moving picture theaters than that charged by the Provincial Board. This is exceptionally significant as there has been considerable talk in several Ontario towns of making moving picture theaters pay an extra war tax. This will also kill the idea of making theaters pay a tax in accordance with their size as the maximum tax is thus placed at $150.

TORONTO BRIEFS.

Otto Elliott, a member of the local Board of Censors since it was first organized has been appointed assistant provincial inspector of theaters and will look after theaters in Toronto. Mr. Elliott's place on the Board will be taken by John J. Burns, who was recently appointed to act in an advisory capacity by the Catholic Bishop of Toronto.

Mogler Theater Opens

Picture House, With 1,200 Seats, Just Opened in Saint Louis Has Interesting Architectural Innovation—In It Apartments for Housekeeping Take the Place of Balcony—Owner Lives in One Apartment and Will Let the Others.

By A. H. Giebler, St. Louis Correspondent of Moving Picture World.

THE new Mogler theater, which was opened at 9th street and Bremen avenue on March 17, is one of the most complete, and at the same time one of the most unique amusement houses in St. Louis. The Mogler is the first example of the new idea in theater building that was originated by a St. Louis architect recently. The theater differs from other houses in the fact that it has no balcony, the space in the building usually taken up by a balcony is made use of in this instance by turning it into an apartment. A suite of six fine living rooms, with bath, reception halls, enough closets to make any housewife sick with envy, and all of the up-to-date features of a metropolitan apartment house, are built into the front part of the theater. Mr. Mogler occupies the rooms himself, and is right at home with his business day and night.

The merging of the flat or apartment with theaters is creating much comment; two more theaters are being erected on the same plan, and Mr. Mogler is kept busy showing the rooms and arrangements of the house to visitors. The new Mogler theater is just up the hill from the canvas-topped theater that Mr. Mogler operated at Broadway and Bremen for more than eight years, and represents the culmination of his ambition of years. The house, which seats 1,200, is very complete in every way; an all-picture program is maintained, and the place is packed at every performance. Mr. Mogler, who is one of the pioneer exhibitors of St. Louis, is a tireless worker for the upbuilding of the moving picture industry, and is recognized as having made a signal success of the business.

WILL BUILD NEW THEATER.

A plot of ground with a frontage of 385 feet, at the corner of Spring and Gravois avenues, has been bought by J. S. Feydt, Jr., who is said to represent several influential south side business men, who will build a large moving picture theater on the property. The location of the proposed new house is in a rapidly growing neighborhood, which has lately been made very attractive by the widening and paving of Gravois avenue. More than a hundred and fifty new dwellings and flats have been erected in the vicinity of the corner during the last two years, and it seems a most favorable location for a theater.

WOMAN'S LEAGUE WILL CENSOR

The Woman's Civic Federation of East St. Louis has decided to censor moving pictures. At the regular monthly meeting held April 12, a committee of six censors was appointed, each member of the committee will watch the shows in her neighborhood, and report all films that she deems unfit to the manager of the theater. The action of the Federation is said to be the outcome of the showing of pictures in exclusive residence districts on the east side, which were objectionable to members of the league.

PAGEANT THEATER NEARLY DONE.

The beautiful new Pageant theater that is being erected on Delmar Boulevard just east of Hamilton avenue, is nearing completion. The house will seat 2,000 and will use an exclusive moving picture program. The building, which will cover 106 by 157 feet of ground, and will cost $40,000, will contain four stores on the ground floor, and bachelor apartments on the upper floors, in addition to the picture playhouse.

Change in Program Suit

Strand Theater of Washington Brings Suit Against Famous Players Exchange—Claims It Booked "Captain Courtesy" and Was Notified That "Snobs" Would Be Sent—Change Followed Theater's Notice to Terminate Contract at End of Month.

By Clarence L. Linz, Washington Correspondent of Moving Picture World.

THE Strand Theater Company, a corporation of the District of Columbia, last week asked the District Supreme Court to enjoin the Famous Players' Exchange, of which George M. Mann is the local manager, from making any changes in its program as booked.

The theater company operates a motion picture theater seating 1968 persons at the corner of Ninth and D streets, northwest. It alleges that on October 26, 1914, it entered into a contract with the Famous Players' Exchange, which it says is the distributing agent for certain photoplays produced by the Paramount Pictures Company, whereby the latter was to furnish until the termination of the contract by either party on thirty days' notice, two changes of program weekly for the sum of $500 per week, the photoplays making up the program to be selected by the theater company.

In the manner described the plaintiff company had notified the exchange on March 22, of the designation of certain photoplays for the half of the month of April, which selection included "Captain Courtesy" for April 18 to 21, inclusive, and the booking was confirmed in a letter from the local branch signed by G. H. Payne, said to be its assistant manager.

It was on March 27, that the theater company notified the exchange that at the expiration of thirty days it would take advantage of its right to cancel the contract, following which, on March 30, it was notified by the exchange that the booking for April had been rearranged and that the photoplay "Captain Courtesy" would not be given in the program but the one entitled "Snobs" would replace it.

The Strand Theater Company states that "Captain Courtesy" is a photoplay of great merit, the leading part being taken by Dustin Farnum, and it was accordingly well advertised for presentation for the four days commencing on April 18, and that by reason of being unable to make such exhibition it will suffer serious losses in its reputation and patronage.

The plaintiff company further states that it is of the opinion that the acts of the defendant, through its agent, Mr. Mann, are purely arbitrary and unjustifiable, and wholly because of resentment on the part of the latter because it had terminated the contract. The court is asked to issue an injunction to compel the exchange to furnish the photoplay in question as booked.

In answer to the charges, the defendant exchange, through Manager Mann, denies the statements concerning the advertisement of the production in that "such so-called advertisement is of a most indefinite character consisting of such statements as 'coming' without dates of exhibition except a few days at most before actual exhibition of a given play." It is further stated that Mr. Payne is without authority to make statements or promises concerning exhibitions and that Mr. Moore, president of the theater company, was informed in part to that effect.

They claim the facts in the case to be as follows: "That on or about March 22 the plaintiff had decided to terminate its contract with the defendant. Its president then knew that while the release date for the play 'Captain Courtesy' was nominally April 19, it was, by reason of the aforesaid agreement, not released until April 26, and the plaintiff also knew that the play due on April 19, was a play called 'Snobs' produced by the Lasky Company. With this knowledge and also that said Mann was temporarily absent from Washington and that said Payne was without authority to change schedules, said plaintiff also knowing that it was about to terminate its contract so that in due course the play 'Captain Courtesy' would not be available, and wishing to secure the last named play which it deemed more attractive than the play called 'Snobs' the president of said plaintiff conceived the idea of taking advantage of a situation with which he was perfectly well acquainted, and using the telephone, obtained an erroneous statement from said Payne, who is a mere clerk in the office, purporting to show that " 'Captain Courtesy' was available for exhibition April 19." It is claimed that the theater company "devised the plan of assuming ignorance which did not exist," in wiring the home office with respect to the date of release, that it knew that Mann was the only officer authorized to speak and act in the premises, and that the "telegrams were deliberately sent in furtherance of a plan then already formed to take advantage of Payne's mistake and to lay the foundation for a claim of some kind, probably for a refund of part of the plaintiff's deposit in furtherance of which this suit is filed." It is also denied that the Strand Theater Company will suffer any loss by reason of the defendant's refusal to furnish the play in question.

JOHNSON-WILLARD FILMS.

Can Not Be Imported Through Mails.—How Law Stands.

No possible loophole is left for the introduction into this country of the motion picture films depicting the fight between Johnson and Willard recently staged in Havana, Cuba. Should they be offered in the ordinary way open for the entry of foreign merchandise, such entry would immediately be opposed by the customs officials representing the government. Transmission by mail within the country would also be denied the films for inquiry of postal officials as to what action the Postoffice Department would take with reference to fight pictures elicits the information that the Act of July 31, 1912 (37 Stat. 240), provides "That it shall be unlawful for any person to deposit or cause to be deposited in the United States mails for mailing or delivery, or to deposit or cause to be deposited with any express company or other common carrier for carriage, or to send or carry from one State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia to any other State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia, or to bring or to cause to be brought into the United States from abroad, any film or other pictorial representation of any prize fight or encounter of pugilists, under whatever name, which is designed to be used or may be used for purpose of public exhibition."

It has been rumored that an effort would be made to weave a romance around the fight pictures and thus secure their entrance into this country. A reading of the law would show the futility of such scheme. Lawyers familiar with the interstate commerce laws have stated that the law in question is so sweeping that the taking of motion pictures of prize fights for display in this country, is an absolutely profitless and useless thing to undertake.

It is thus to be seen that the law applies with double force to the Johnson-Willard pictures, in that they were taken in a foreign country from which importation is prohibited and in view of the law quoted.

GOVERNOR OF MAINE SIGNS WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION

New Measure Will Affect Picture Houses and Theaters.

GOVERNOR CURTIS of Maine has signed the Workmen's Compensation Act, which provides in substance that employees totally disabled shall be paid one-half their average weekly wages for three hundred weeks, the sum to be paid not to exceed $10 a week or a total of $3,000 altogether. In case of death the heirs of deceased employees are to receive this compensation from the employers. For partial disability workmen are to be paid from $4 to $10 a week, according to a sliding scale. If an employer of more than five workmen comes in under the provisions of this act he cannot be sued for damages by the injured employee. Corporations which maintain liability insurance for their employees are not obliged to come in under the provisions of this law. Employers having five or less employees are not liable to the operation of the act. It goes into effect on July 1.

The strides made by the World Film interests since E. B. Tinker took over eastern New England are phenomenal. Every important town is represented on the circuits of this house, and Mr. Tinker has built up a record business in a few months. Mr. Tinker is well known to all exhibitors down East, as he was for some time with Eclectic, Pathe and the General Film Company. He has worked for all these companies under the direction of Frank H. Vine, who is now Boston manager of the World.

Moving picture theaters in the state of Maine generally report an increased business following the end of Lent. In many places throughout the state new theaters are opened after having been dark for the winter season. The state of Maine is anticipating the greatest summer business in its history during the coming summer and the moving picture theaters, especially those at the resorts, expect to reap a harvest as a result of the influx of summer visitors.

Small Riot Over Film

Griffith's "Birth of a Nation" Gets Boston Colored Folks Excited—Many Police on Hand Avert Serious Disturbance—Handing Out of Already Reserved Tickets Misunderstood by Negroes Who Suspected Discrimination.

By Edwin H. McCloskey, New England Correspondent of Moving Picture World.

THE presence of three hundred police officers undoubtedly prevented a serious race riot at the Tremont theater, Boston, where the Griffith spectacle "The Birth of a Nation" is playing, on Saturday night, April 17, when several hundred negroes stormed the box office and demanded tickets.

As a result of the turbulance in the lobby and in front of the theater before, during and after the performance, eleven persons were placed under arrest. Among the prisoners were William Munroe Trotter, editor of the Guardian, a colored publication, who was publicly rebuked by President Wilson last November, and who has been the leader in the movement to prevent the production of the film in this city and the Rev. Aaron W. Puller, colored pastor of the People's Baptist Church, Boston.

The theater management had learned that there was an organized plot to fill the house with negroes, destroy the films and stop the play. Superintendent of Police Michael H. Crowley was communicated with and assumed personal charge of the police detail. Policemen in civilian dress were stationed in different parts of the theater and were ordered to arrest anybody making a disturbance.

The trouble started in the lobby of the theater before the opening of the performance. The lobby was jammed with both whites and blacks. Half an hour before the scheduled time for the film to be screened, the sale of tickets was stopped. The house and company representatives say that the ticket rack was clean and that they couldn't sell any more standing admissions. Patrons, who had ordered tickets in advance, kept coming to the window and getting them. Others were buying for future dates. The colored persons who were gathered in the middle of the lobby evidently thought that discrimination was being exercised against them for that night, for suddenly there was a general move towards the ticket office and a demand that tickets be sold.

Earlier in the week, Governor David I. Walsh requested Police Commissioner Stephen O'Meara to meet him at the State House as a result of many complaints that have been received regarding the production.

The conference lasted over an hour during which the production and the offence it has given many people was discussed from its various angles. The commissioner was asked by the governor if there was any legal way in which the commissioner might act to prohibit the production. The commissioner replied that none exists. While the governor has no power to act in the matter, it is known that he is deeply concerned over the production.

Deputy Chief George C. Neal of the state police has placed a ban on the exhibition of the production on Sundays in the state. The management of the film states that it was well aware that such a production on Sunday was not in conformity with the state regulations, but that upon request, the production was offered to the Lynn Lodge of Elks.

BARS "THE NIGGER."

The Fox Film Corporation feature photoplay "The Nigger," which was to have been presented at the Crown theater, Everett, Mass., during the past week, was barred by order of Mayor James Chambers, upon the recommendation of the board of censors, to which the mayor referred the matter upon protest by colored citizens. A number of colored men, at the instance of the National Equal Rights League, lead by Arthur Woodest, waited upon the mayor and made known their objections. The censorship board comprised, the Rev. Ansel E. Johnson, chairman; General E. Leroy Sweetser, Mrs. Gertrude Spaulding, William J. Brickley and R. Frank B. Rich.

GRIFFITH TO MAKE HOLY GRAIL PICTURE

The Great Story Has Long Attracted Him—Studying Abbey Pictures.

David W. Griffith, producer of the "Birth of a Nation," in an interview with the World correspondent, stated that he is elated with the enthusiastic reception which Bostonians are giving to his great spectacle. He also announced that his next production will be a film based on "The Quest for the Holy Grail" and while in Boston he spent considerable time at the Boston Public Library studying the paintings of Edwin Austin Abbey, which are based on the subject. In discussing the production in Boston, Mr. Griffith said:

"I am very much enthused over the manner in which the Boston audiences are appreciating the film. Since we opened here we have played to capacity houses. In fact we have taken in more money in a single day than any legitimate production, which has played this theater during the year, has taken in in a week."

"The advance sale is beyond all expectations. Of course the production was widely advertised. A large number of persons have written to me stating that they would rather pay ten dollars to see this film than to pay one dollar for any dramatic production."

"For the past two years, I have been desirous of producing "The Quest of the Holy Grail" for the screen. I have been studying those wonderful paintings in the Boston Public Library on the subject. The rights of reproduction are controlled by Mrs. Edward Austin Abbey, the artist's widow. I have written to Charles Scribner, the New York publisher, who is Mrs. Abbey's brother-in-law, and who manages her affairs opening negotiations for the motion production."

NEW THEATER IN WINTHROP.

Charles L. Hatch has opened his new theater at Winthrop Centre, Winthrop, Mass., under the management of John H. Foye. This house has a seating capacity of 925 and is equipped with every modern convenience. Incombustible materials have been used throughout and the heating and ventilating devices are modern in every way. The sight lines and acoustic properties were especially designed, so that every seat commands a view of the stage and the lowest tone spoken by the performers can be heard in all parts of the house.

BIG CONCORD HOUSE PLANNED.

Jacob Conn, proprietor of Conn's theater at Concord, N. H., is planning the erection of another theater in that city on the site of Duntley's Garage at the corner of Pleasant and Main streets. It will be of fireproof construction and will seat 1500 persons. Work has been started in razing the garage. Mr. Conn is an active exhibitor and is vice president of the New Hampshire Motion Picture Exhibitors' League.

Quality Plus Economy

Quality has long been a known factor in the TWO REEL BIOGRAPH; but few exhibitors realize they are saving the renting cost of at least one or two additional reels every time they book the TWO REEL BIOGRAPH.

It is optional with us to follow the customary practice and extend a production to the maximum footage, or cut the length of the production to meet the action of the story. We prefer the latter, which is an established Biograph policy that holds good on all Biograph productions.

ESSANAY.

SUE (May 3).—Sue Newland, the daughter of Senator Newland, a millionaire, sees in the Herald the notice of a contest to decide the most beautiful girl in the city to play the part of "Sue" in an Essanay photoplay. She decides to enter and sends her picture to the editor of the Herald. A few days later she receives notice that she is among the lucky girls who are to pose for their pictures at the Essanay studio. This posing is to decide who will be the winner. Jack Rankin, a star reporter on the Herald, is assigned to the story and goes out to the studio in a very peevish frame of mind. There, however, he loses it, for he meets Sue and they fall in love at first sight. J. Mortimer Rose, a dissipated son of a millionaire who has a lot of newspaper influence, learns that Sue has entered the contest. He follows her out and tries to make her give up the project. That night Rose is arrested in a gambling raid and released through Jack's influence with the captain. Later Jack hears that Sue has been chosen. He brings the good news to her and they declare their love.

THE PROFLIGATE (Special—Three Parts—May 4).—The profligate, a lovable but dissipated young man, is cast off by the man he believed to be his uncle, because of his dissipations, and told that he was a foundling. When the uncle is found murdered and his safe robbed, evidence points to the profligate. He is finally acquitted, although many believe him guilty. The profligate goes into the country, where he reforms. There he meets a girl with whom he falls in love, but her friends knows the profligate and tells of his past. The profligate determines to find the real murderer. He traces a man who was trying to pawn some bonds to his home, and discovers it is a man supposed to have been the bosom friend of his "uncle." He forces the man to confess.

A locket is accidentally dragged from the profligate's pocket and the murderer recognizes it. The locket had been placed on the neck of his baby when he had driven his wife and child from the house. The woman had left the child on a doorstep and ended her own life. The profligate is staggered by the thought that he is the son of the murderer. As he stands there the girl he loves walks into the room. She comes to bring him back some trinkets of her friend who had died and who was a niece of the murderer. She has heard all and throws herself into the arms of the profligate. They turn to find the murderer, overcome by fright, has succumbed to heart failure.

THE FABLE OF THE GALLOPING PILGRIM WHO KEPT ON GALLOPING (May 5).—After flying his way all around the globe, the bachelor was ready to light. A young, ambitious belle learned that a case-hardened bachelor with a hatful of money was back in town. Every struggling girl needs a foxy business manager. In other words, what is home without a mother. The business manager made a touch in behalf of a worthy charity and just happened to bring her little girl (aged 24) with her. The bachelor showed some of the things he had picked up abroad and the girl went wild. Once outside the door, the mother spoke as follows: "Keep the soft pedal on your natural instincts or you will tip your mitt." She enticed him into her lair and poured tea for him, and he dreaming of home and fireside, fell under. When they went shopping the vigilant chaperone had to be on the job and he couldn't be extravagant. Not he! Could he entire his timid bird inside a worldly cafe? Well, we should rather hope, suppose and guess not! Well, they married, and the bird took the brakes off. An old bachelor who had settled down because he was sick and tired of foreign travel, was taken by the hand by his Birdie and they started round the world.

HOW SLIPPERY SLIM SAW THE SHOW (May 6).—Slippery Slim and his wife go to see a company of barnstormers perform in the opera house. Slim carries the baby. The barnstormers, like Shakespeare, are not bothered by details. They use a chair or a table with signs like "This is a safe," etc., so as to let the audience in on the reasons for their acting. Slim and his wife are revelling in the drama. Mrs. Slim, womanlike, has fallen in love temporarily with the bold bad villain. But the baby raises its voice in protest, probably in sympathy with the rag doll on the stage, which is being mauled by its alleged mother and father and burglar all at the same time. So Slippery, under protest, goes outside juggling the baby. He is there when the show is ended and he is one of the thousands who was not uplifted by the drama.

THIRTY (Special—Two Parts—May 8).—Ellen March, several times a millionairess, has a deep rooted hatred for the press and all that pertained to newspapers. So when a rumor of her engagement to Count Dangloff reached the city room of the Clarion and the city editor sent Dick Thompson, star reporter and poker player, out on the story, he had his work cut out for him. He climbed the wall and entered the garden of Miss March's home only to be set upon and beaten by two giant guards. The guards lead him into Ellen's presence, where Dick proceeds to fall in love with her. She told him that if he didn't keep her name out of the papers she would put him in jail. He, because he loved her, said he would, and started a rumor that anarchists were going to blow up old man Rockford, a neighbor of Ellen's. In the manufacture of his plot, he was shot as an anarchist and fell wounded into Ellen's arms. Ellen admits that she loves him, finds out that she owns the Clarion and makes Dick her husband and managing editor of the great newspaper.

A PILLAR OF FLAME (Special—Two Parts—May 1).—Selfish, snobbish, and with a burning ambition to become a great singer, Madeline Danby leaves her husband and child, Beatrice, to take up vocal lessons with Julius Gerhardt, a celebrated music teacher. Encouraged by his flattery, she continues the lessons until her money is gone. Then she asks Gerhardt for the public appearance he had guaranteed her. He agrees to carry out his promise under certain conditions. Realizing she has been tricked, she denounces and leaves the rascal. Without his influence, however, she finds there is no opening for her in opera, and eventually is glad to accept a position in a cheap cabaret. As the result of a row with a young loafer, she gets fired and rather than go back to her husband, the embittered woman writes him she has destroyed herself. Having cut the last tie binding her to the straight and narrow path, she prepares to go back to the operatic stage—and Gerhardt.

Years later, Danby is remarried to a quiet, middle-aged woman, who makes a good mother to Beatrice, who has inherited from her mother a craze for music and the stage. Stopping at the village hotel, Vashti-Vetsera, otherwise Madeline, decides to drop in and say hello to Danby. He is horrified when she smilingly introduces herself, but with tigerish delight, she goads him by threats of exposure. At dinner she meets Mrs. Danby, the second, and makes things very uncomfortable for all concerned. As yet Madeline has not seen Beatrice. While planning a sort of grand surprise party, Beatrice and Madeline come face to face. Learning the girl's ambition, the woman's soul has been so hardened that she at first tells Beatrice she will take her back with her and introduce her to life as she has found it, but gradually her better nature asserts itself. Recoiling at the thought, she accidentally backs into the flaming gas jet, and instantly her flimsy gown is ablaze. Shrieking, she plunges down the stairs a veritable pillar of flame. Madeline exacts a promise from Beatrice to give up all thoughts of the stage, then dies in her daughter's arms.

CUTEY'S SISTER (May 3).—During commencement week at college, Cutey Cartwright finds time hanging heavily on his hands, especially when the fellows refuse to introduce him to their sisters, complaining he is too much of a cut-up and heartbreaker. Cutey gets an idea and buys a photograph of a beautiful actress. Inscribing on it, "To Cutey from his loving sister," he leaves it in a conspicuous place in his room. When his friend, Jack, drops in he at once spies the photo, and as the news spreads, Cutey finds himself the most popular young man in town. All the boys now introduce him to their sisters, anxious to make the acquaintance of Cutey's beautiful "sister." Cutey and Alice, Jack's sister, fall deeply in love, while Jack starts complications by purchasing beautiful flowers and dollar-a-pound boxes of candy for Cutey's sister. Cutey consents to act as "go-between" and greatly enjoys the situation. All might have gone well, but unfortunately, the actress, whose photograph Cutey has, arrives in town with her husband. Jack meets her on the street and speaks to her. After some very indignant queries on her part and awkward explanations on his, she has him arrested as a masher. He phones Cutey for bail, and the latter hurries over to the actress's apartment at once, not knowing Alice and her brother have taken the room next door. Cutey explains to the actress and begs her not to expose his deception. While they are talking, she hears her husband coming, and Cutey climbs through the transom into the next room. He sees Alice staring speechlessly at him on the other side, but chooses the lesser of two evils and drops into Alice's room, leaving his coat-tails in the husband's hands. The latter rushes around to the other room, and Cutey comes near being shot, but Alice comes to his aid, and after explanations all around, he is forgiven and reinstated in favor.

A CHILD OF THE NORTH (Special—Two Parts—May 4).—Nan, a half-breed girl of the North, lives with her ill-natured and dissipated father in a small hut near the banks of the Mossejaw. Col. Stanton, owner of a large amount of land in that neighborhood, one day saves the girl from her father's brutality and exhibits a friendly interest towards her. During a terrific forest fire, she saves the life of Richard Burton, a stranger, who, disguised as a hunter, is secretly looking for coal outcroppings, hoping to buy up the land cheap. A kiss awakens love between the two and she goes to live at his camp. For a while he is very kind to her. One day she overhears him say he will cheat her old friend Cal out of his timber land. After much cogitation, Nan warns her old friend that the man she loves is going to cheat him out of his land, so he refuses flatly to sell when approached by Burton.

Meanwhile Burton has met an old school chum, Lillian Baker, and is at once fascinated by her beauty. When Nan, becoming remorseful for what she has done, decides to ask Burton's forgiveness, she finds he is preparing for a hasty marriage to Lillian. Her love turns to fiercest hate. Racing back to camp, she secures a heavy-bored rifle, and just as Burton and Lillian stand before the preacher, she kills him with one shot. She then goes to Cal, and, learning the Royal Mounted Police are after her, he tells her to meet him next day by the lower lake. She makes her escape through the dangerous rapids in a canoe, but fate takes a hand and winter comes on with a sudden bitter cold and snow storm. She loses her way on the lower lake and, after paddling for hours, feels the fatal drowsiness slowly coming over her. Next morning Cal finds Nan is not at the cabin and finally locates the girl out in the lake, her canoe frozen fast in the ice. She is motionless, and when Cal touches her he finds the North has claimed its child—she is dead.

A LILY IN BOHEMIA (May 5).—His health undermined, Hugh Storey, a young violinist, is ordered to the country to recuperate. At a little country farm house, he meets Lillian, a typical farm girl, sweet, wholesome and unspoiled. They fall in love, and after a picturesque courtship, are married. Hugh, now fully recovered in health and spirits, takes his bride back to the city with him. He introduces her to his artist friends, but Lillian feels very much out of place in her Bohemian surroundings, and soon becomes unhappy. Francois, a temperamental, but good-hearted and sincere friend of Hugh's, sees how matters are going, so he endeavors to patch up things in his own way. After teaching Lillian to sip wine, smoke cigarettes and dance, he takes her to a masquerade ball, where, in disguise, she meets her husband. Although he does not know who she is, Hugh is charmed with her grace and vivacity, and begs the fair unknown to reveal her identity. She laughingly refuses, but when unmasking time arrives, Hugh finds to his astonishment that he has been dancing with his own wife. He is delighted at first, but when the men begin to monopolize her attention, leaving him feeling like an outsider, he gets jealous. After the dance he gives a little celebration at his studio, and Lillian offers a toast to her advent into the magic circle of Bohemia, which brings forth rousing cheers. By this time, Hugh is feeling pretty glum, but when he complains to Lillian he prefers her as her old, sweet self, she retorts, "I'm only playing the game as I've watched you play it." After the others have gone, he promises to give up his present mode of living and Bohemianism tendencies, if she will do the same. She delightfully agrees, and the next time Francois sees them he finds a blissfully happy couple, leading a simple but happy domestic life.

THE PARK HONEYMOONERS (May 6).—While on their honeymoon, Mr. and Mrs. Camerafiend plan to take many pictures abroad, but the European war prevents their going, so at uncle's suggestion, they decide to spend their honeymoon in the parks of their own city—New York. With their cameras loaded "for bear," the two sally forth to first take in the sights in Central Park, Manhattan. After viewing the Maine Memorial Monument at the 59th street entrance, they stroll through the Mall to Swan Lake, where they watch those beautiful birds floating about. Then comes a view of Bethesda Fountain, one of the largest of this class of structures, next the Grand Staircase, an imposing expanse of stonework and architectural beauty, then the famous Egyptian Obelisk. We are given a close view of the quaint hieroglyphics which were cut into the massive shaft by ancient Egyptian artisans thousands of years ago. From here the honeymooners visit the old Washington Blockhouse, a relic of the Revolutionary War, then on to the 59th Street Lake, with a view of the same spot in winter garb, showing thousands of skaters gliding over the ice. At the ball grounds, mischievous youngsters play a practical joke on the newlyweds, so they pile into a taxi and start for Brooklyn. At the entrance to Prospect Park, they view the Soldiers' and Sailors' Monument, the beautiful Vale of Cashmere, and the big lake where a miniature yacht race is in progress. They watch the tiny boats skim over the water, then hire a boat themselves and go for a row. All the way home both marvel at the excellent preservation of the natural beauties of the parks and tell uncle they really did not know there were such interesting local spots. Their pictures are shown, with a novel effect in their transformation from a still photograph to a moving picture.

THE VANISHING VAULT (May 7).—While stopping at the Bronzegilt Hotel, Slick and Slim, two high-class and well-dressed burglars, overhear Baroness Vodka tell the manager she wishes to place her million-dollar box of jewels in the hotel vault, which is set into the wall at the end of the hallway. The manager accordingly escorts her to the big safe, and she watches him place the little box inside. Next morning the manager goes to cash a check for the Baroness, and finds the whole vault has completely vanished! Frantic, the bewildered manager telephones the Tubbs National Detective Agency. Tubbs himself, with Billy and Constance, his wonderful assistants, reach the hotel in a jiffy. He posts Constance in the cloak-room, Billy disguises as a bell-hop and Tubbs as the head waiter. Constance finds a compromising letter in one of the crooks' overcoats, and Tubbs overhears some of their plans. Billy, by lightning disguise changes, learns of a package in Slim's possession marked "dynamite." He is nearly cornered in the crooks' room, but escapes by ducking into the nearest refuge, which happens to be the laundry chute. Billy takes a slide to the cellar, where he hears hammering above him. His suspicions are confirmed when he later gains admission to Slick's room and finds the dynamite. Tubbs discovers that the length of the inside room, compared with the hallway where the safe had stood, varies considerably. Investigation discloses that the burglars have simply put up a blind wall in front of the safe, then deliberately proceeded to break into it. The false wall is battered down and after a sharp fight, the crooks captured. As it turns out, the Baroness is recognized as a well-known female crook and the jewels found to be paste. She was in league with the burglars and planned to recover money for her lost "diamonds."

THE BREATH OF ARABY (Special—Three Parts—May 8).—Becoming too persistent in his attentions, Clothilde, Mlle. Chevasset, daughter of a wealthy aristocrat, determines to place De Launay, whom her father wishes her to marry, in a compromising position. This she carries out, her father enters, and, believing the man is insulting his daughter, challenges him to a duel. De Launay receives a mortal wound. Mlle. Chevassat endeavors to fascinate Captain Thurston, an army officer, with whom she is passionately in love, but that gentleman is a married man, and proves to be an honorable one, in that he meets all her advances cooly. Learning that Ahmed Hassan, a wealthy Persian, has in his possession, the last drop of "The Breath of Araby," the most potent of love charms, Clothilde uses all her allurements on the Persian to make him give her the little flask containing the precious drop, which she intends to use on Thurston. She finally gains her end, and "The Breath of Araby" becomes her property. She then sends for Thurston on a fake message to meet her at the Chat Noir, a cafe. Her father sees the message, and crushed at thought of what she is about to do, determines to end it all, so taking a bottle of poison and a revolver to the Blue Room of the Chat Noir. While he is trying to decide which means to use, he hears a knock. Hastily swallowing the poison, he lies down on a couch with the revolver cocked in his hand. The proprietor enters, and, thinking the man asleep, covers him with a robe. Clothilde enters shortly afterwards, and, seeing the reclining figure on the couch, believes Thurston has already arrived. Bending over the dead man, she pours the precious drop on him, just as Thurston, himself, enters to keep his appointment. Horrified, she grasps the hand of the supposed sleeper to turn him over. The movement contracts the muscles of the trigger finger, somewhat in the manner of reflex action, the pressure fires the cartridge and the bullet enters the heart of Clothilde, ending her career forever.

HIS CONVERT (May 1).—From a window in the club Gerald Morgan looks out upon a gathering which is being addressed by a fanatical religionist. Morgan is wont to regard the work of the evangelist as a financial venture, and doubts the sincerity of the preacher and his fellow-workers. Morgan offers to bet that he can go out on the same corner in evangelist's garb, and in three evenings make as many converts as the preacher. His proposition is accepted.

In her room in the cheap section of the city, Lizzie is having an altercation with Bennie, an underworld character. She hands him the money she has in her purse, and after they have drunk of the liquor Lizzie has brought in, Bennie rolls over and goes to sleep. The following evening Morgan appears on the corner and starts to preach. Soon a large gathering is listening to him. As Lizzie is passing the spot, following a man who has given her the sign, she hears the words of Morgan, and pauses. They make a deep impression. The next evening she also has occasion to pass the place where Morgan is preaching, and gets closer into the crowd. She returns to her room and indicates that she is tired of the life she is leading. At the saloon where she meets Bennie she acts indifferently and walks away, leaving him there.

After the second evening's work, however, Morgan begins to take the work seriously. On the third evening Lizzie is about to rush out to listen to the preacher once more when she is detected by Bennie, who follows. In the crowd Bennie steals a bill fold, and places it in Lizzie's pocket so that she is caught with the goods and arrested. At the station a policeman tells of how he saw Bennie transfer the pocketbook to Lizzie's pocket, and she is liberated. Bennie has made good his escape, and returns to their room. When Lizzie returns he attacks her. Morgan, who has followed Lizzie to the police station, has also followed her to the room and rescues her just in time. They decide to go out and serve their Master together, and the next night are seen preaching together on the same corner.

CARTOONS IN THE KITCHEN (May 4).—Andy Eetes has just returned from the store with a copy of the Grouch Chaser, which he gives to the cook. It is raining, and Andy inadvertently places his rubbers on the table, next to the carrots for the soup. The cook reads the Grouch Chaser and in a minute is in spasms of laughter. She first turns to "Hot Off the Pen," in which the old couple in bed are annoyed by a dog who persists in singing to them. The dog listens to a band-man play on a huge brass instrument, and decides that he has music in him. The artist runs short of ink, and looking at the dog, sees he has swallowed the bottle. The cook is convulsed with laughter, but continues to neglect the soup and goes on reading. "Nightmareland" next greets her gaze. The baseball fan has a dream in which he sees himself batting against a star pitcher. The pitcher serves up all kinds of grapevines and fadeaways and the fan strikes out.

The cook, without taking her eyes from the book, drops Andy's rubbers into the soup. In the meantime Andy and his parents are waiting for dinner. "Dr. E. Z. Bear" is the next cartoon. He treats a hippopotamus with pills which have to be shovelled into Lady Hippo's mouth. Instant relief is noted. By this time the angry father comes out and demands the dinner. The cook serves soup in which Andy's rubber has been boiling. The whole family then takes the book and sees "Tom, the Tamer." Tom is blowing his brass instrument, and the elephant, wishing to help him fill "that thing with wind," blows through the other end of the horn. Tom is inflated to four times his size. The elephant then supplies a vacuum cleaner and draws Tom, not only back to his natural size, but into the cleaner.

JACK KENNARD, COWARD (May 5).—Jack Kennard has returned to his home from New York for the holidays. Ed Cottrell, a classmate of Jack's, is also in town. Hardly has Jack greeted his parents when a note arrives from Miriam Phelps, inviting him to her home. Jack is seated talking to Miriam when Cottrell enters. It is evident that there is jealousy between Cottrell and Jack. As the situation is embarrassing, Jack rises to go, getting the assurance of Miriam, however, that she will accompany him to the Easter Monday dance. When he has gone, Cottrell asks Miriam how she can love a man who is considered a coward at college. He tells her he will prove it at the dance.

Jack receives a letter from the dean of the college informing him that he will be liable to expulsion if he does not pay his many creditors who have entered complaint against him. In order to square himself, Jack borrows $300 from Cottrell. At the dance, Cottrell, in the presence of Miriam, calls him a coward. Jack resents this, and when a scene seems inevitable, Cottrell takes Jack aside and reminds him of the loan. Jack meekly walks off, leaving him with Miriam, rather than have her know. Miriam still holds her confidence in Jack and repulses Cottrell.

Back at college in New York Jack is downhearted. His mother has, in the meantime, learned of his debt to Cottrell, and paid it. Miriam received a letter from her aunt in New York inviting her to pay her a visit. Hoping that she might see Jack again, she accepts, and arrives in New York. Cottrell recognizes her on the street and learns her address from the chauffeur, but Jack does not know of her presence in the city. While waiting for an elevated train, Jack sees a child on the tracks in the path of an on-coming train. He rescues her, the girl being the sister of one of the boys Cottrell had hired to beat up Jack a few days before. Miriam happens on the platform as Jack is helped off the tracks. She recognizes him and invites him to the house. While there the brother of the girl whom he saved telephones to Miriam, and tells her that Jack had fought several men a few nights before because one spoke disparagingly of Miriam. The newspaper, the morning after the fight, stated that Jack was beaten up because he made certain remarks about a lady. Miriam looks at Jack and asks whether it is true. It is.

WITH BRIDGES BURNED (Special—Three Parts—May 7).—Louis Mitchell is doomed to keen disappointment, as he enters the office of Comer & Mathison, steel contractors, by whom he is employed as a salesman. Mr. Comer informs him, in characteristic fashion, that business is "rotten," and that Mitchell, with other members of the sales force, will be obliged to take a vacation. At home, his bride is reading a trade journal, when her eye runs across a notice to the effect that Robinson & Ray of London are to rebuild their mammoth South African cyanide tanks, destroyed in the Boer War. Hardly has Mitchell returned home, and imparted the news to her, when she proposes that he try for the $3,000,000 Robinson & Bay contract. She accordingly draws her $1,000 from the bank to finance her husband on his trip. Mitchell succeeds in getting a letter of introduction from Comer & Mathison, delegating him as their accredited representative, and authorizing him to formulate bids in their name. With his wife's $1,000 drawn and apportioned, Mitchell realizes that the bridges have been burned, and there is no retreat.

In London Mitchell finally gets an audience with the director-general of the firm of Robinson & Ray, who tells him he is late, and it would be impossible for him to figure the estimates in the short time which remains. Mitchell is told that the bids must be in positively by twelve o'clock on the 31st of the month. Mitchell works night and day on the plans. Grigsby, a rival competiter for the contract, by trickery, learns that Mitchell's figures are lower than his, and as it is the day before the 31st, it is too late to alter his. He bribes the chief clerk to fix the clock on the following morning. A nervous wreck from the great strain, Mitchell hurries to the Robinson & Ray offices on the 31st, and to his dismay, the clock and the watches of the chief clerk and Grigsby point to 12.10. Dropping the plans, he rushes, heartbroken, from the place. Struck by pity, the office boy, whom Mitchell had tipped on a previous occasion, reaches through the office railing, gets the bids and takes them to the inner office. In America, a couple of weeks later, Mitchell gets a telegram from Comer & Mathison to the effect that their bids were accepted, and that he has been appointed sales manager.

A SAD DOG'S STORY (May 8).—Jerry Wadsworth, just a dog, after experiencing the vicissitudes of a dog's life for several years, he lands on the pedestal in the Blue Ribbon Kennels, where he is exhibited for sale. As Jerry sits with another "mutt" he tells his story. It was when he was a puppy that Charlie Grant brought him to New York from the West, and gave him to Claudia Poole, a stockbrocker's wife, who had a few years before turned him down for her present husband. Suffice it to say that Claudia was overjoyed to receive Jerry. But Claudia's husband was too practical to concern himself with a mere dog, and flew into a rage when he set eyes upon defenseless Jerry, snuggled beneath the robes in a baby carriage. That night, when Mr. Poole was obliged to get out of a warm bed and give Jerry the milk bottle, there was a storm.

"In the meantime," continues Jerry "Charlie Grant was making a strong play for Claudia, and as her husband was too absorbed in his business to consider her or me, she was inclined to encourage him." He took her to a cabaret show, and her husbaid, finding this out, was sore. Then Mr. Poole's business failed, and everything looked dark. Well, everything would have been all right, notwithstanding, had it not been for mother-in-law who arrived upon the scene in response to a telegram from Claudia, invoking financial assistance. Jerry sought to take a bite out of her hand, and five minutes after he was swimming in the river, where the maid had thrown him. Two boys rescued him and in the course of a couple of months poor Jerry was sold and resold, abused and battered. As he is telling this part of the story, Mr. and Mrs. Poole enter, and, seeing him in his wretched condition, rescue him and take him home.

"SAFETY WORST" (May 1).—Billington Biggs is a worker in the cause of "Safety First" and gets a lot of cards of warning printed. He gives one to Bill Jones when he catches him spooning with Jane Judson. He gives one to a man who is about to lend some money to another man and gets beat up because of it. He hands a card to two men who are fighting and he gets the worst of it. He gives one to the man at the gasoline station and after the explosion he gets a can on the head that knocks him out. He hands one to the men who pull him out and they proceed to throw him back again, and that is the finish of him.

"THE UNDERTAKER'S DAUGHTER" (May 1).—Mattie Cook, the undertaker's daughter, loves John Scott, who has no job. Her father wants her to marry Sime Sloan, who has a job, and it takes all of Mattie's persuasive power to overcome Dad's objections, but she is equal to the occasion. She gets rid of John's two rivals, Sime and Bime, by promising to marry them if they will prove their love for her. To prove it one must sleep in one of her father's coffins and the other sit by it all night. Unbeknown to one another they come to fulfill their promise. After some hesitancy they settle down to the task. It really looks as if she would have to marry one or both, when she thinks that a little noise would help some. With the aid of John, she manages to get rid of both. In their fright they run through the meeting house presided over by Dad, who gets a couple of spills. He finally decides that John is the most sensible and thinks he can help in the undertaking business.

"ROAD O' STRIFE" No. 5 "NO OTHER WAY" (May 3).—Alene is almost brokenhearted at the apparent indifference of Robert Dane, and is utterly miserable at the thought that Abner Gray will be put to death because she told of the ring. In desperation she appeals to a lawyer for advice. He tells her that it is on her testimony alone that the prosecution will attempt to convict Abner of the murder of Gershom, and that there is no way by which a person can evade giving testimony, the only exception to this being that under the laws of this State a wife is not permitted to testify in a trial of her husband. Alene then sees how she may save Abner, if they are married before he can be brought to trial she cannot be compelled to testify and he cannot be convicted.

Beyond this primary fact, she does not consider the effect of the marriage as pertaining to herself—to her it appears only as a formality. She acts with decision, and before the furious prosecuting attorney can interfere, she is Abner Gray's wife. Abner is still held in jail, and Alene returns to the Duncan house. Here she finds a note signed "Robert Dane" directing her to come at once to a certain lonely old mill, and she immediately sets out. This note is a forgery, having been sent by Clara, Gilbert Jerome's former flame, who, mad with jealousy, has determined to take Alene's life.

Meanwhile, Dane has learned through the press of the arrest of Abner and of the fact that Dr. Duncan and his wife have been subjected to quarantine, and is hurrying back to the village, apprehensive of what may happen to Alene while alone. Alene arrives at the abandoned mill, and is lured into the building by Clara, who tells her that Dane is waiting. Clara opens a door, gives Alene a violent shove into the room, and laughs in wild triumph. The rotten floor boards give way, and Alene plunges into a deep pool of slimy water.

"CURSES! JACK DALTON" (May 4).—In this cartoon picture the love and jealousy between Jack Dalton and Jim Dorney is at fever heat. Jim sees his loved one through the window at the piano and quickly makes himself welcome. Clara plays "The Maiden's Prayer," and Jack listens in his room on the floor above. Love and music take possession of him and he cuts a hole in the floor through which he dives and, grabbing Clara by the hair, lifts her to his own rich apartment. Jim follows without assistance and wages a merry chase, over housetops and across the river. He is assisted by a good-natured stork who permits him to hang to his legs. Passing a battleship Jack hauls the fair maiden on board, but Jim overhauls a submarine and diving aboard fires bombs at the ship. He then rescues his loved one and hurls curses at Jack Dalton.

Nancy leads Bill a merry chase at the end of which Bill is glad to hand over all the cash. Nancy then calls Eva on the telephone and tells her that she can come home as she has cured Bill. Eva returns home and finds a very different husband awaiting her.

"WHO VIOLATES THE LAW" (Special—Three Parts—May 5).—Sheriff Black, winking at the illegal sale of liquor in the county, permits Mother Hubbard, proprietress of "The Dark Secret" near the Soldiers' Home, to sell to old soldiers. The go-between is one Henry Pank, an ex-prize fighter, who is in love with Linna, Black's daughter, though neither the girl nor the father know of the attachment. Recently, some of the old soldiers have been robbed near the den, and Black sends word that Mother Hubbard must stop these outrages. She defies him and sends Pank to tell Black that he dare not touch her.

Bob Nelson, a young reporter, is the accepted suitor for Linna's hand, and is assigned by his paper to run down the whiskey selling. He interviews Black, who plans with Pank, to fool Nelson by pulling a fake raid. He sends word to Mother Hubbard to be ready for the raid, but his message miscarries and the appearance of the officers catches her unawares. She barely manages to hide the evidence of her guilt. The superintendent leaves, satisfied, but Bob finds an overlooked bottle and determines to get a scoop for his paper. That night, he goes to the place, disguised as an old soldier, collects evidence, and is about to leave, when he is discovered by Sloan, a habitue of the place, and an enemy of Panks. A fight starts in the dark room and when Mother Hubbard rushes in with the police, Sloan is dead and Bob is standing over him. He admits the killing and no one suspects that Sloan was really killed by Pank, from the doorway, he having taken this means to be revenged on his enemy and also on his rival. The Bob is charged with murder he proves that Mother Hubbard has sold liquor, and she is also arrested, but is released with a heavy fine.

Thinking that Black is responsible for her arrest, she plans vengeance through Linna, and depends upon Pank's love for the girl to carry through her plan. She sends word to the girl that she has proof of Bob's innocence, and will give it to her if she will come to the den. When Linna arrives, she is made a prisoner, and when Pank reaches the place Mother Hubbard tells him that she is ready to deliver the girl to him. But Pank surprises her by declaring that he will not be a party to the scheme, and tries desperately to rescue the girl. He is beset by Mother Hubbard and her two sons, but manages to fight them off. Linna reaches a phone and sends a message to her father. Immediately afterward she and Pank are made prisoners in the back room of the den, in which a fierce fight begins. While the police are speeding to the place, the struggle continues. Mother Hubbard is killed and Pank is nearly overcome by the two sons. Cut and bleeding, he fights on, protecting the girl at all costs. The lamp is upset and the room takes fire. The doors are locked, and escape is impossible. Pank finally overcomes the two thugs, but both he and Linna are overwhelmed by the smoke and flame. As the building is tottering, the police arrive and Linna is rescued. Pank is dragged from the den, but lives only long enough to make the confession that it was he who killed Sloan.

SUCH THINGS REALLY HAPPEN—(Special—Two Parts—May 6).—Bill Brandon loses his job on account of drunkenness and dishonesty He forms a partnership with "Rat" Melton, a professional swindler, and they organize "The Successful College of Photoplay Writing." The affair is a fake. Steve Hadley, a young clerk in a village store, and Rose Archer who supports her old mother by sewing, are sweethearts, but have postponed their marriage, Steve's small salary being inadequate to their support. Both are saving every possible cent, their dream being to purchase the store in which Steve works. Steve and Rose read the advertisements of the Brandon "college," and each determines to seize the golden opportunity offered, but to keep the matter a secret. Their hard-earned savings vanish rapidly in "tuition charges," "registration fees," and other charges. Each has given up work, so that his entire time may be devoted to the writing of photoplays. Each is surprised and puzzled by the conduct of the other, and a lovers' quarrel grows into a serious breach.

Brandon meets Rose and lures her to the city by assuring her that all she now requires to make success sure is a little actual worldly experience. Rose uses the last of her money to carry out Brandon's suggestions, and he regards his triumph as certain. Steve, meanwhile, has at last had an awakening and has gone to the city to visit a motion picture establishment. He is soon convinced that photoplay writing is a matter of natural talent and experience, and in kindly way is shown that he is without either. The postoffice department has begun an investigation of the Brandon "college," and Steve eagerly assists the Inspector in completing the evidence which will convict Brandon of using the mails to defraud. Melton realizes that this particular swindle has been pushed to the limit, and decides to decamp with his own and Brandon's money. Brandon comes upon him as he is robbing the safe, and in a fight Melton is killed. Brandon realizes he must flee, but vows to take Rose with him. The postoffice inspector and Steve arrive at the office a few minutes after Brandon leaves, and perceives that he will now be wanted for a crime much greater than they were preparing to charge.

Brandon has succeeded in getting Rose into his automobile, but as they pass Steve, the inspector, and an officer, the girl gives a cry for help, and is recognized by Steve. The inspector recognizes Brandon, and they pursue in a passing machine belonging to the motion picture company, being accompanied by a mounted cowboy. At length Brandon is forced to abandon his machine, Rose, and the money. He cuts across a field and catches a freight train just gaining speed. All, except the cowbody, thinking Brandon, who has climbed to the top of a box car, has made an escape, have gathered about Rose. The cowboy rides rapidly away, and at a point where the road parallels the track overtakes the train, swings his rope, and drops a noose about Brandon's body. The next second the murderer and swindler is jerked from the top of the moving car. The story of the lovers has aroused much interest about the studio, and there is easily collected a sum sufficient to make their dreams come true. They find prosperity and happiness in the station and occupations to which they are suited.

"THE SPY'S SISTER" (May 7).—Bob Fulmer lives in the mountains with his sister, Joy. The Civil War is at its height, and Bob, a boy of sixteen, is anxious to join the Southern forces. Because of his youth and ill health, Joy has prevented him. Unknown to Joy, Bob steals away, and joins a band of guerrillas under the command of Webb. Joy, accidentally, runs into Lieutenant John Gladstone of the Union force. She assists him in bandaging his slightly wounded arm.

In the course of time, Bob becomes a successful scout for the guerrillas, and Gladstone receives an order to go on a special mission to capture the "boy spy." He learns the locality of the boy's home, and establishes a camp. Again he encounters Joy, and rescues her from insult at the hands of one of his men, but he does not guess that she is the sister of the boy he is trying to capture. Joy learns Gladstone's mission. She warns Bob of his danger, but does not tell him of the presence of the soldiers. Gladstone, seeing Joy often, finds that he has fallen in love with her. She in turn confesses her love for him. Joy has steadfastly refused to allow Gladstone to accompany her home, always disappearing from him like a sprite when she leaves him.

Finally, however, Gladstone tracks her to the cabin. That night Bob arrives, sent by Webb to find the camp of the Union soldiers. He meets her near the cabin and shows her a false moustache he has made, so that no one will suspect him of being the "boy spy." Gladstone, coming to the cabin, sees Joy pleading with Bob to go, and mistakes it for a love scene. Too honorable to watch them through the window, he raps at the door. Frantically Joy forces Bob into an inner room, and opens the door. Gladstone demands that she tell him whom she is concealing. She denies that there is anyone there, but Gladstone opens the door, and discloses Bob. Then, to save her brother from capture, Joy tells the lieutenant that the man is her lover. He turns without a word and leaves the cabin. But now Bob knows that the Union soldiers are near, and is determined to find them.

Joy rushes from the cabin, trying to warn her lover. Joy overtakes the lieutenant, but Gladstone refuses to listen to her. As she is pleading with him, they hear shots. Gladstone rushes off toward the sound of firing, and finds the "man" from the cabin, shot by his men and dying. Joy follows him. As she bends over Bob, he raises himself weakly, pulling off the disguise. Then Gladstone understands. He has found the boy spy. The next morning Gladstone prepares to return to his duty. He is leaving Joy alone in the mountains. Then comes the news. Lee has surrendered at Appomattox. With the reunion of the nation, a life of happiness opens before Joy and Gladstone.

THE BUSY BELL BOY (May 8).—Fidgie is happy as soda dispenser in a drug store and might have gone on mixing drinks forever had he not met Marion. It was love at first sight on his part, and he makes an impression with his delectable soda, but Marion's mother hurries her out. Fidgie tears off his white coat and scampers down the street in pursuit. At the Hotel de Riche he contrives to get the number of their suite and boldly demands a job as bell boy. Fidgie is downcast at the manager's refusal, but bribes a bell boy to feign illness and Fidgie takes his place. He outdistances all the boys in their dash to answer the first call to 214—Marion's rooms. He joyfully assists her in ministering to her mother, who is ill, and again, when Count Dandrough, who is pressing his unwelcome attentions upon the girl, is entertained at dinner by Marion's mother, Fidgie disguises himself with a dinky little moustache and a waiter's apron, and serves the meal. He deftly strips off the Count's toupee and serves it as soup.

The Count is more than ever repulsive to Marion and she almost refuses to accompany him downstairs to the hotel dansant. Fidgie then dons the evening clothes of a guest and mingles with the dancers, on the lookout for Marion. His perfect bearing awakens no suspicions in her mother's mind and Marion dances away with her bell boy sweetheart. Their brilliant dancing evokes enthusiastic applause and Fidgie is in a dream of bliss when the irate guest, bereft of his evening togs, exposes Marion's dancing partner as a mere bell hop. Fidgie dashes out, with every one in pursuit. He races upstairs and through corridors, only to find refuge in the elevator with Marion. They descend to the lobby, elude the mob which tries to intercept them, and finally Fidgie gains his first kiss from Marion as they meet around the corner.

A DOUBLE WINNING (May 1).—Out of the talk at the Sportsmen's Club arises a wager between the globe-trotter and his friend, who bets that he will not be able, within a fixed time, to find his way out of an isolated mountain location to which he will lead him. Arriving at the junction, the two principals and their friends proceed by wagon to the interior, and then by foot along a difficult trail, the globe-trotter being blindfolded. He is left with provisions and an alarm clock, which will announce to him when he may remove the bandage from his eyes and start to make his way out. In the woods he meets a prospector's daughter, whom he accompanies to her father's cabin. He becomes so interested in her that he forgets the wager until the eleventh hour and, at the old man's suggestion, telegraphs his success to the club. While the men are away on this errand, two bandits besiege the lone girl in the cabin. Her lover arrives in time to rescue her. Thus he wins, not only the wager, but a bride.

ROSES AND THORNS (May 6).—Stanley Phillips has a beautiful wife, but she is a social butterfly and the affection between them is only lukewarm, their only tie being their little boy of three years. Phillips leaves for a hunting trip in the mountains. Far away in the mountain wilds lives a child of nature, Edna, with her feeble old father. A great misfortune comes into the life of the girl when upon awakening one morning she finds her father has passed away. She leaves her mountain home and goes away in search of she knows not what. Three days later, weak, hungry and faint, she falls from the steep mountain trail to the roadway below. Stanley's auto coming along the roadway, runs over the girl before his driver can stop the car. The machine is stopped and Phillips, picking the girl up tenderly, takes her to a hospital in the city and sees that she is given a private ward and cared for in the best possible manner.

As the girl grows stronger she develops a great love for the noble man who has saved her life and he also finds in her that which is lacking in his own married life. Upon her recovery, he places her in an elegantly furnished apartment and sees that she lacks nothing in the way of comfort. He prepares to take his family for a trip abroad, and then comes the great struggle with himself.

Shall he go to the one he loves or return to his family and his disdainful and supercilious wife? His little boy climbs to his lap and he finally sees his only course. He will see his "Fairy of the Mountains" and bid her a last farewell. While his wife is making arrangements for the trip he goes to the florist's and buys a bouquet of roses, little knowing that he is followed by his small son at a distance. He takes the flowers to the girl's apartments and tells her he must leave her forever. She protests, but just at this point, Phillips' little son breaks into the room and with opened arms rushes towards his father.

All is finally explained. With great emotion, Phillips pleads his love for the girl, but she tells him she understands and for him to go, it being his duty as a married man. The concluding scenes show Phillips standing sadly beside his wife and boy on the steamer, looking over the distant sea, while in her apartment the girl he has learned to love crushes a rose in her hand.

GENE OF THE NORTHLAND (Two Parts—May 8).—Jeanne La Roche lives alone with her brother in the great Northwestern country. Jacques is a ne'er-do-well and has fallen under the suspicion of the mounted police, two of whom are dispatched to arrest him for robbery. The stolen goods are found in his home. Jeanne is too young to be left in their lonely cabin, so she is taken to the Post, where the wife of the proprietor welcomes her and gives her a home. Several years later, Donald McLean wins her for his wife. Meantime Jacques escapes from prison, eludes his pursuers and takes refuge in McLean's home. Recognizing him, Jeanne hides him until she has dispensed with the police, then carries food and drink and an exchange of clothes to him and bids him an affectionate farewell.

McLean, upon returning, sees his wife in another man's arms. He shoots the stranger, leaving him for dead; locks his wife in the cabin and proceeds to the tavern to drown jealousy in drink. Meantime, Jacques, recovering consciousness, staggers off. Jeanne, angered by the unreasoning anger of her husband, disguises herself in an old suit of his, steals out through the window, discovers her brother has gone and follows his footprints. McLean, returning, finds both gone, apparently together, and starts after them. Jacques is taken care of by a friendly Indian and Jeanne finds refuge in the home of Cox.

Mrs. Cox is touched by her story and has Jeanne in her arms when Cox enters. Cox, seeing the affection displayed by his wife toward a strange "man," shoots and wounds the girl. Explanations follow and Jeanne is given a home with them. Fully recovered, Jacques, with much money from a trapping trip, through the northern woods, grows reckless and returns to see his sister, only to find her gone. He makes his way to the tavern, where a poker game is in progress. He flashes his money and is followed and murdered by a half-breed. Suspicion falls on McLean. He is arrested and taken to police headquarters. Meantime the half-breed, sorely wounded in the encounter which proves fatal to Jacques, staggers to the home of Cox, confesses his crime, and tells of the arrest of McLean. She arrives in time to save him and all ends happily.

IN THE HILLS BEYOND (May 8).—Doris, the only daughter of old Reuben Meade, is the sweetheart of her father's hired man, John Carew. All goes well with the country lovers until one day the Thornbys arrive from the city to spend some time upon Reuben Meade's farm. Clayton Thornby is attracted by the fresh young beauty of Bess Meade, and she is not unwilling that he shall pay her attention. She does not know, however, that Thornby is married, as she has never met his wife, and it is only his first day at the farm.

Thornby gradually weaves his net about the country girl, who little suspects the evil heart of the man who pretends to love her, and ignores the love of her old sweetheart, John Carew. Soon, however, John discovers her new attachment, and learns that Thornby is accompanied by his wife, so plans to break up thoughtless Bess's dream, and save her from possible humiliation and disgrace. Bess refuses to listen to John's entreaties, so finally he confronts Thornby and tells him his wife desires to see him. Ashamed and baffled, Thornby slinks away. Bess is angry at this rude awakening from her beautiful dream and refuses to notice her rescuer. Not at all discouraged, however, he picks her up and bears her to the house. When she arrives there, John finds Bess has undergone a change of mind and the last of all shows her with head upon his bosom.

THE HONOR OF THE ORMSBYS (Three Parts—April 26).—When Maurice Ormsbys, son of John Ormsbys, leaves for New York, his father admonishes him to be careful with his conduct, and impresses him with the fact that for ten generations no stigma has ever been known to the family name. Maurice promises to be good, but fate decrees that he becomes acquainted with Mary Hampden, an actress, playing at the Folly theater, New York. He visits gay cafes with her, and is successful in winning Mary away from her admirers by his magnetic personality. A few months later Maurice asks her to become his wife, but she gives him a negative reply, perceiving that he is a little under the influence of liquor. She promises to give him a definite answer if he should propound the same question with a clear mind. The next day he puts the same query to her, and she, after making him understand the disparity of their stations in life, agrees to marry him. His father reads of his marriage to the actress, and forthwith dispatches a letter to him, telling him that from now on his allowance will be suspended. Maurice receives the letter the morning after a night of debauch. Mary manages to get hold of the the letter and thereupon decides that Maurice must make his own way in the world without the assistance of his father's financial aid. Casting aside their life of affluence, they take modest quarters in another part of the city, and live happily for a while. But the lure of their former life proves too strong for Maurice, and they rapidly become poverty stricken. After five years of squalid living, Maurice again appeals to his father for aid, but the old man, who has become a recluse, tore up the letter. His butler, Roberts, learns of Maurice's plight, and sends him $50. The letter falls into the son's hands as he is leaving his poor surroundings and instead of returning with it to his wife, spends it all in a saloon. He is thrown out dead drunk, and shoved on a ship bound for China.

One of Mary's former admirers learns of her struggle and comes to her. Mary is about to go with him when her little baby comes creeping towards her. This brings Mary to a realization of her act, and she orders the tormentor out of the room. Roberts and his wife are determined to seek Maurice and place him on the right path. He learns where the son and his wife live and brings her and the baby to an unused part of the Ormsbys mansion. The strain of worry begin to take effect on John Ormsby, and he falls seriously ill. The doctor orders careful nursing, so the old butler and his wife put Mary into service. In time the old man becomes himself again, and thinks of what a happy life his son would have led if he had married such a charming girl as his nurse. He even offers to marry her, but she refuses, feeling that her husband would return. At last Maurice returns, his long forced abstinence from drink curing him of the desire for liquor. He trails his wife to his father's home, where a happy reconciliation takes place.

GRAND OPENING OF WORLD'S ONLY MOVIE CITY (April 16).—This film comprises views taken of the celebrations attending the opening in March of Universal City, Cal., the only municipality in the world devoted entirely to the production of moving pictures. "Big Charlie," the Universal elephant, leads the parade up to the gates of the city, where, before a crowd of twenty thousand people, President Laemmle opens the giant lock on the gate to the city with a solid gold key, six inches long, presented to him by Laura Oakley, "chief of police" of Universal City. President Laemmle, Vice-President Robert H. Cochrane, P. A. Powers, their wives, representatives of the moving picture trade press, the employees of Universal City, several thousand strong, and thousands of Los Angeles and Southern Californians thereupon enter the city and attend the ceremonies attendant thereon.

The spectators view the aeroplane flights of Aviator Frank Stites in the production of "The Mysterious Contragrav," a Gold Seal two-reel drama featuring Marie Walcamp and William Clifford, which was released on April 6. Visitors are then taken to the great stage, where twenty photoplays can be produced at once. Later a rodeo is staged and Jane Bernoudy, an actress, and hundreds of Indians and cowboys display their skill with the rope and as equestrians. Director McRae then tries to mount a bucking mule with laughable results; a director's horseback race is held, in which Francis Ford wins a foot-high silver cup; and cowboys indulge in a potato spearing contest. The final scenes show the grand ball held on the outdoor stage, pictures of which were taken at night.

FOR CASH (Two Parts—May 3).—Vera Ronceval has been brought up in seclusion by her father, Amos Ronceval, a recluse. One day she meets Orthen Owen, an artist, and they fall in love. When Amos learns of this, he forbids Arthen to see his daughter, and in his rage suffers an attack of heart disease. Dying, he commits Vera to the care of her cousin, Mr. Ronceval, a lawyer.

Mr. Ronceval takes Vera away with him to his city home. Arthen, unable to find further trace of Vera, falls upon evil ways, neglecting his art and finding forgetfulness in dissipation. Reduced to poverty, he makes a contract with Lee Varick, famous as an artist, whereby Arthen is to paint pictures, signing Varick's name to them. Varick has acquired his reputation by this traffic in the work of others. In the meantime, Vera, has been living with her cousin, Mr. Ronceval, who is a friend of Varick's, and who greatly desires a match between Varick and Vera. Although Vera has never forgotten Arthen, she has, to please her cousin, conditionally consented to an engagement with Varick.

One day Vera meets Arthen in his fallen condition and, learning the story of his fall, she tells him that she still loves him, and that she will break off her engagement with Varick. At the same time Arthen, obtaining a new lease upon his manhood, seeks Varick out to return the check just given him for the sale of his name and work to Varick. Vera calls upon Varick, tells him that she knows of his mode of obtaining fame and that she will not marry him. Varick, believing that he has her in his power, attempts to commit an assault upon her. Just then, Arthen, on his way to return Varick's check, hears Vera's cries for help and breaks into Varick's studio. He knocks Varick down and rescues Vera. He then takes her to her cousin, who, upon learning the whole story, gives his consent to the marriage of Vera and Arthen.

THE FAITH OF HER FATHERS (Three Parts—May 4).—The even tenor of life in the ghetto of New York is rudely interrupted by the advent of a young man who opens a Christian Mission for the Jews in that quarter of the city. Bertha, the daughter of the old Tamor, the Rabbi, appeals to her father to rescue the young man from the hands of an angry mob of Jews who assail the doors of the offensive mission. The young missionary is carried to the Rabbi's house, where he is tenderly nursed back to health, having been very cruelly treated at the hands of the mob. Almost unknown to either a strong love affair develops between the Rabbi's daughter and the Christian, who finally decides to ask for the hand of the Rabbi's daughter. A violent scene follows in which the young missionary is forbidden the house by the old man.

Old Tamor feels the disgrace keenly when he reflects that his daughter should desire marriage with a Christian and even takes the matter up with the ten wise men of the synagogue. At a public meeting in the synagogue he rises to pronounce the sentence of excommunication upon his own daughter, when he is stopped by a younger Rabbi, who is presiding. Looking straight toward the place where Bertha is seated in the women's gallery the younger man gives a forceful recital of the trials and pains her ancestors have borne in order to remain true to the faith, dwelling especially upon their terrible persecutions.

He ends his speech with a final appeal to the girl, asking her if she is to be one who will willingly turn away from the faith her fathers have so earnestly striven to preserve inviolate. The young man's lesson sinks deep into the heart of the sorrowing girl. She leaves the synagogue, but just as she is about to enter the humble tenement house she sinks down dead of a broken heart, the sacrifice of her love. Her father, at the synagogue, is informed of what has occurred and, hurrying to the scene, has his daughter borne into the house. Meanwhile, the Christian is wholly oblivious of the great sorrow that is passing. Silently old Tamor kneels at the side of his daughter's bier and as the story ends we feel sure his faithful daughter smiles upon him from her place in Paradise.

THE PAGE (May 3).—The scientist loves his young wife, but is so deeply engrossed in his work that he unconsciously neglects her. The man, a neighborhood friend, becomes a frequent visitor. One night the scientist has refused to come to dinner as he is engrossed in an experiment. The wife eats alone and later the man comes in. Together they look over an old album of photographs of the two of them in various sports of other years. The scientist is bothered by a vagrant memory of something he has forgotten. At last he remembers. He has bought a present for his wife, a bracelet, and has not yet given it to her. The experiment has arrived at a stage where he can leave it, and he starts for the house.

The wife and man have turned the pages of the album until suddenly they turn one more page and there is a single picture—one of the scientist. After that the pages are empty. The wife ponders on her loneliness and the man tells her that he has loved her all the years, but did not realize it until lately. Then the man fiercely takes her in his arms, and pleads with her to come away with him. The scientist overhears this and also hears the wife admit her loneliness and tell the man to come the next day for an answer. The scientist creeps away to the laboratory, half-conscious of what he is doing. He mixes chemicals at random and suddenly there is an explosion.

The wife sees the burst of flame and hurries to the laboratory. She finds her husband on the floor face downward, unharmed except his eyes and face. The next day he is pronounced hopelessly blind and the man, arriving for his answer, is told by the wife that she cannot leave now, that her duty is to the helpless husband. The man pleads with her that she has all her young life before her and should not be tied down to a cripple.

The scientist overhears this conversation, too, and gropes about his bedroom until he finds two revolvers. With these he goes to the sitting-room and confronts the frightened man. But the scientist is not bent on murder. He gives the man one of the revolvers and then, to make the thing fair, says they will turn out the light and count ten before firing. He pushes the button and the room is in darkness for five counts, then the lights flare up. The man is discovered at the button. He raises his gun to shoot the unconscious scientist when the wife steps between them and orders the coward from the house.

TONY (May 7).—Tony, a peasant of the poorest Italian type, listens to a friend, who has prospered in America, and deserts his native heath, to try his fortunes in the Land of Liberty, leaving his wife and baby, until he has earned enough to send for them.

After a few years of hard toil, the required amount is accumulated, but the morning he goes to the bank to withdraw his little hoard he finds a notice on the door notifying depositors that payment has been suspended. Armitage, a local millionaire, is induced to come to the bank's relief, which he promises to do after an examination of the books. As he drives away in his auto, he is mistaken by Tony and others as the cause of the failure. Tony follows him to his home, and from behind a hedge watches him as he plays with his little girl. He seeks an opportunity to be revenged on him, but as he watches, the father leaves the little girl and goes in the house.

The child plays about the lawn for a time, and then strolls over to where some men are at work, excavating for an artificial lake. They have lighted the fuse of a blast, and no one sees the child but Tony as she walks nearer the deadly spot. At last Tony can stand it no longer, for as he pictures his own little girl in this one's place, all thoughts of revenge are banished and, rushing to the spot, he picks up the child just as the blast goes off. He saves the girl, but at a terrible cost to himself. He is picked up unconscious, and for days and days he raves in a delirium. Armitage gathers from the babbling tale of Tony just what has happened and sends for the little Italian mother and child, so that the first sight that Tony sees when he awakes from his long delirium are those who are dearest on earth to him. The last scene in the play shows Tony hard at work for Armitage, while their two little girls play together nearby.

LAEMMLE.

$100,000 (May 2).—Frank Edmanton, secretary to the president of the First National Bank, is a married man, yet he is infatuated with Lila Holmes, a woman of the half world. Lila herself is disgusted with the part she plays in life, especially so when her mother refuses to accept money from her, knowing her mode of making her living. Lila's mother has all her savings in a small country bank. Lila waves aside Frank's entreaties that she join him, with the statement that she can never consent to such a proposition unless he can supply her with the luxuries she has been accustomed to.

There is a run on the country bank in which Lila's mother has her money. The president 'phones the First National in the city, asking for aid to ward off the rush of depositors demanding their money. Frank is selected by the president of the First National Bank to convey a large sum of money to the country bank. Feeling the money once within his hands, Frank is tempted to use it, and goes to Lila's apartment, shows her the money and begs her to flee with him. Lila, realizing in him another victim, consents. She bids him wait below until she gets ready to leave.

Suddenly her eyes fall upon a paper naming the depositors of the bank. She then realizes that her mother's savings are in jeopardy unless the money reaches the country bank. Seizing the bag containing the money, she leaves the house secretly, and, forcing Frank's chauffeur to do her will, is driven to the country bank, where she arrives just in time to allay the fears of the frenzied depositors. Her mother is in the crowd at the door, and recognition between them follows, with forgiveness. Frank, meanwhile, has found Lila absent from her apartment and decides he has been tricked. He goes home with the intention of quitting life, but his wife finds him with the revolver in hand about to kill himself.

He tells her the whole story from beginning to end. His wife calls the country bank on the 'phone, where she learns what has happened. The president of the bank puts Lila on the 'phone and she asks for Frank. She dismisses him with the statement that she is going home with her mother, and admonishes him to be good to his wife. Frank explains to the bank president that, falling suddenly ill, he had turned the money over to Lila for delivery and no one except his wife and Lila suspects his intended absconding.

THE LITTLE GIRL OF THE ATTIC (Two Parts—May 5).—Following the death of her mother, Helen Marsh, a girl in her early teens, is placed in a select boarding school in New York City. Her father, Philip Marsh, has been disowned by his father, a Southern planter, because of his marriage years before. On the outbreak of the Civil War, Phillip returns South to enlist in the Confederate Army. He pays his father a visit and again pleads with him for the privilege of bringing his daughter to his old home, but his father refuses his request. He joins his regiment and old "Uncle" Caesar, a family slave, goes with him.

Mrs. Galloway, principal of the school, not having heard from Helen's father, writes him demanding payment for her tuition and in the meantime makes Helen do housework. Phillips is killed and when Mrs. Galloway receives this news through one of his brother officers, Helen is immediately made a "slave" and is given a room in the attic of the boarding school. She suffers many hardships and privations and is the fag of every school girl. Uncle Caesar, fearful of returning to the plantation because of the anger of his old master at his leaving with Phillip, makes his way North and secures employment as janitor of an office building in New York, which adjoins Mrs. Galloway's school.

From his window he looks into Helen's attic and frequently sees the unhappy child. During her absence he brings delicacies to her and one night they meet. He learns who she is. The grandfather, remorseful, finally decides to go North and look for his granddaughter. He meets old Caesar on the sidewalk in front of the two buildings. The negro tells him of finding Helen and brings the old man up to the attic.

On this particular evening a birthday party is being given one of the scholars, but Helen has not been allowed to attend it. Thus "Uncle" Caesar and her grandfather find her on a little cot weeping in grief. The old Southerner takes her downstairs and they burst in upon the party, the old negro following. Mrs. Galloway is severely censured and endeavors at the last moment to make reparation. The story ends by Helen being taken home to the old plantation, where she lives happily with her grandfather.

leads a fast life and one night, comes home in an intoxicated state to his father's disgust. The State Legislature passes a law dealing with eugenics, which requires a physical examination of both parties, prior to marriage. While seated in his library, the father reads a newspaper article announcing that the law has gone into effect. He naturally thinks of his son and while wondering what the future may bring forth, he falls asleep.

He dreams that his son returns home after having been rejected by the medical examining board and that his son, angry at his father's desire that he see the fast life, hands him a revolver, with the demand that he kill him. The father refuses, whereupon the boy, taking the gun, shoots himself. In reality, however, the boy regrets the life that he has led and persuades his fiancee to accompany him to the medical board. Both return home. The father is overjoyed on learning that his son is in perfect physical condition.

RENE HAGGARD JOURNEYS ON (Two Parts—May 6).—The picture opens with a series of diaphragm effects, retaining the court room atmosphere.

The judge is seen seated. Garwood, the prisoner is laboring under a terrible strain as he looks up at the judge. A look of pity comes over his face as he looks at his mother. Then we see his sister. Her brother meets her gaze. Then the foreman of the jury. He finishes speaking. The prisoner registers that his doom is sealed. He sets his jaw and looks at his mother. Then the mother and his sister look toward him and he at them. The judge speaks: "Rene Haggard, you have been found guilty of murder is the first degree and it is the order of this court that on the morning of March 27 you shall be hanged and may God have mercy on your soul." The prisoner's jaw sets. The scene shows the heart-broken mother and the distraught sister. The mother turns to her son and, looking at him with tearful eyes, asks: "My boy, why did you do this?" The boy turns to her and looks into her eyes. As he does so the scene fades away to tell the story.

The fade shows the sister leaving her little country home to make her way in the city. She is bidding good-bye to her mother and her farmer brother. Then is shown her hopeless fight in the city, her marriage to a good-for-nothing drunkard, his supposed death; then of her meeting with her present husband under different circumstances; of their marriage and then their baby, the crowning joy of her life, then home, a picture of blissful content.

The boy leaves home to visit his sister. She tells him her story. Then her first husband, rescued from apparent death, discovers her and endeavors to blackmail her. He is still her legal husband. She gives him all she can and, driven to desperation, pleads with him to spare her but he refuses. In despair she goes to her brother. He tells her to meet the man at night in a certain place and that he will be there. She agrees and the appointment is made.

The night of the murder arrives. The brother meets his sister, and the sister leaves. The brother, masked, waits. The man comes up. The brother shoots and kills him, just as an officer turns the corner. The boy is arrested. The sister pleads with him to keep her past a secret. He agrees to do so. Friday, the 27th. A hill looking toward the prison can be seen. Over the prison the black flag, the sign of an execution, rises slowly. The mother sees the flag as it fills out. Then is shown the tear-stained face of the resigned mother as she gives one final look at the flag and turning, starts off down the hill, to disappear up the road.

SI PERKINS IN "THE CITY OF DELUSION" (May 1).—Uncle Jeremiah, en route to the Panama-Pacific Exposition, stops off at Hollywood, California, to see a friend. With Uncle Jerry are Merrilee, his grand-daughter, and Mollie, their servant. Uncle Jerry's friend is on hand to meet him, and the party is driven to the friend's ranch home. In the evening, Uncle Jerry evinces a disposition to wander over the ranch. His host furnishes Uncle Jerry with a horse, and Uncle Jerry expresses a desire to go alone, the rural guest rides off. Unused to his surroundings, Uncle Jerry misses his way. He dismounts, to look about him, and his horse gallops off.

Proceeding on his way, Uncle Jerry comes upon a shed. The shed will afford him shelter during the night. Morning comes, and with it a troupe of "movie" people. The property man wants the shed. The director, having a sense of humor, orders the property man to get the shed, but not to disturb the sleeper. The action follows and the company exit. From the background enter a troupe of girls, made up as angels, who are to take part in the scene. Uncle Jerry awakens, sees, as he thinks a company of angels, and believes himself to have died during the night. His brain befuddled, Uncle Jerry questions the girls, whose replies befuddle him all the more. Finally, they lead him to the edge of the hill. Uncle Jerry gazes below, where he sees Universal City, crowded with visitors. The angels bid him seek the city, then exit.

At the edge of the crowd he meets a Mephisto and three imps. They, thinking him an actor in makeup, kid him, but this only adds to the old man's mystification. Later, he blunders upon the main stage, where he gets into further trouble. Still later, while testing himself for proof of death, he is seen by Carl Laemmle, president of the Universal Company, who, in an interview, sets the old man right, then turns him over to a guide. With the guide to instruct him, Uncle Jerry goes upon a tour of inspection. Meanwhile, Merrilee, worried at the non-return of her grandfather, begs her host to go in search of him. Uncle Jerry is found, happy in the company of a number of girls.

SHE WINKED (May 3).—Mr. and Mrs. Trotter, tourists, are discovered in the streets of Cairo, seeing the sights. Trotter employs a native guide to show them around. Trotter is badly henpecked by his wife, Mirandy, and seeks a chance to steal off by himself. The beautiful Princess Haz-em-goin, flirts with him from her balcony above the street. Mirandy sees this and drags her spouse away from the Egyptian vampire.

At a curio stand Trotter manages to get his wife interested and at an opportune moment he and Hunka, the guide, slip away. They are setting out for the abode of the princess when Trotter runs into an old friend from Kansas, named Hi Old top. Although Trotter endeavors to steer Oldtop away, the old chap gets a glimpse of the princess, who bestows one of her bewitching winks on him, but Trotter lets the flirtation drag no further. They get into trouble at a mosque where Trotter tries to get in without removing his shoes and during the melee that follows, Oldtop, with the princess in mind, manages to elude his friend and escapes to see her.

Here he is rudely handled by a bodyguard to the princess and narrowly escapes with his life. Mirandy, in the meantime, has missed her husband and sets out to look him up. She finds him standing in front of a questionable sort of dance place. Something is evidently going on inside which greatly shocks Mirandy and she takes Trotter to task most severely. Trotter tries to figure out some way to get rid of Mirandy. Coming upon a slave mart, where harem girls are bought, sold and exchanged, he sells Mirandy for a mere song, and, free of her, sets out to see the princess. Here he gets into an awful scrap when the body-guard finds him making love to the princess.

Again, as before, Hunka, the guide, pays for his employer's blunder, by getting soundly beaten up and chased by the body-guard. They wind up at a pyramid where Oldtop is seeing the sights and Trotter, taking refuge with Oldtop, leaves Hunka to settle the matter. Both are engrossed with little side bets on the outcome of the fight when suddenly they see something coming which makes the incident of Hunka and his troubles pale into nothingness. It is Mirandy, who has escaped from the harem, outlandishly garbed in Turkish trousers, in pursuit of the slave dealer. Another all round scrap ensues in which Mirandy wins out. She leads the two culprits by the ears and drives the other ahead of her.

NESTOR.

ALMOST A KING (Two Parts—May 7).—The King of Smearcase passes away, leaving no male heir to the throne. The Princess hears the news and the Prime Minister takes up with her the matter of another king. They find that the next in the royal line runs a delicatessen store in America. Jerry, the proprietor, is busy when the news comes. He finds that to succeed to the throne he must be unmarried. He has a wife, but decides that he will try to get the kingdom anyway and say nothing of his previous attachment. On the dock, as he is about to take the steamer, he meets Jack, an old friend of his, whose firm is sending him to Europe on business. He tells him of his new kingdom and invites his friend to run over any time he gets a chance and he will have the Royal Army march around for him.

Back in Limberg, the capital, everything is made ready for the coming of the new king. King Jerry arrives. He is pleased with the Princess he is to marry, but is disturbed by thoughts of the wife at home. The Princess is not favorably impressed with the King and refuses to marry him. The Prime Minister endeavors to settle this difficulty. Jack, King Jerry's friend, calls at the palace. He flirts with the Princess, whom he meets in the palace grounds, and she thinks favorably of the American.

A maid-of-honor oversees the affair and tells the Prime Minister, who has Jack arrested and brought before the King. The old friends shake hands and Jack is turned loose. He meets the Princess again and she suggests that he disguise himself as an officer in the army of the King and that then they will be able to see each other every day. They are caught together again and Jack is again arrested and imprisoned. The Princess and one of his assistants plan to free him. They disguise him and he is given a position as Royal Guard to the Princess. Jerry decides to pay a visit to his future Queen but finds that Jack is there before him and beats a hasty retreat.

Suddenly there is an uproar at the outer gate. At last Jerry's wife and children have searched him out. The outraged wife dashes into the presence of the King and informs the court that she is the King's wife. It therefore becomes impossible for Jerry to occupy the throne and he is led out by his irate wife. The wise heads decide they must have a King and the Princess suggests Jack. It is finally decided that Jack shall be made King and the Princess is at last happy, while Jerry starts back to America with his wife and numerous offsprings.

CAUGHT BY A THREAD (May 14).—Mr. Newlywed frequently has very important engagements. His wife is suspicious of his many "business" engagements and tries to follow him but in vain. One night as she is sewing he advances the same old plea, and starts out. Suddenly she gets an idea and when she goes to kiss him good-bye, she slips a spool of thread into his pocket and holds the end. Newlywed leaves and arrives at the house of his friend where a friendly little game is in progress. Just as he is about to enter, he notices the thread in his pocket. He realizes the trap his wife has set for him and, catching a messenger boy, hands him some coin and tells him to take the thread and walk about. The messenger sets out on his walk. Wifie at the end of the thread is trying to keep up. Her body aches all over from the constant walking but her spirit keeps her going.

Meanwhile, Newlywed has made a "cleaning" and leaves the game with a pocket full of bills. Coming out he is approached by a friend who is having trouble with his motor. Hubby pulls his coat off, lays it on the running board of the car and sets in to help. A ragged hanger-on sees the coat and, seeing a chance to get a coat, sneaks off with it. Meeting his girl he puts the coat on and is telling her about it, when the messanger boy comes along. He is getting tired of trailing the thread around so he slips it in the pocket of the coat which he recognizes as the property of the man who gave him the thread and hurries away.

Wifie is still at the end of the thread and coming around the corner spies a man whom she thinks is hubby. She resolves to be revenged, grabs him by the neck. The poor thief, thinking the owner of the coat has him, slips out of the coat and takes to his heels. Wifie recognizes the coat but not the wearer, so, discouraged at not finding hubby she goes home.

Arriving home she absently runs her hand in the pocket and finds it full of bills. Hubby arrives home, coatless, moneyless and discouraged. He dejectedly sinks in a chair, and in answer to wifie's anxious questions, tells her that everything is all right. He notices his coat in the chair in which he is sitting and stealthily tries to reach in the pocket, but wifie laughs to herself. The story closes when hubby resolves never to lie to wifie again.

THE BLACK BOX (Episode No. 5—Two Parts—"On the Rack"—Released week of April 5).—Sanford Quest is still under suspicion. Inspector French decides to investigate Quest's alibi and calls up Signal Tower No. 10, in which Quest declares he was fighting with Red Gallagher at 11.15, the approximate time when the Salvation Army girl and Quest's secretary were murdered. Upon calling up the tower the inspector communicates with the police, who tell him that the operator's dead body has been found there. Inspector French, without more ado, thereupon arrests Quest and takes him off to prison. Lenora, meanwhile is carefully watching Professor Ashleigh's servant, John Craig, whose mind seems burdened with some weighty secret. Lenora decides that he will bear watching and scrutinizes his every action.

Before leaving for prison Quest is permitted to open the safe in his home. He finds Mrs. Rheinholdt's jewels gone and is dumfounded. Overwhelmed, Quest is led before a magistrate where he is formally charged with the murder of Miss Quigg, the Salvation Army girl, and Ross Brown, his secretary. Lenora is more convinced than ever that Craig knows about the murder of the Salvation Army girl and the secretary, and while Laura calls up the professor she turns on the phototelsme and sees Craig steal into the professor's study with some muslin which he burns in the grate. Anxious to get this half-burned cloth for evidence, Lenora hurries to the professor's home, after telling the latter that Quest would like to have a talk with him in prison. As soon as the professor leaves home, Laura enters and trails Craig, the servant. When he goes upstairs she hurries to the fireplace and lifts the charred cloths from the fireplace into a small bag, escapes in an automobile to her home where she examines the charred cloth under a microscope and finds that it is soaked with blood. She identifies the cloth as part of the dress worn by the Salvation Army girl on her last visit to Quest's study.

Laura, Quest's assistant, meanwhile comes to visit him in prison. She suggests to him that they can change clothes. Despite the danger of his position, Quest cannot help smiling at her suggestion, but they finally up-end a cot in the room and exchange clothes around its edge, modestly screened from each other's gaze. As soon as the change is effected Quest fastens his gaze upon the turnkey and hypnotizes him. He then orders him to open up his cell door. Quest thereupon throws the turnkey into a deep slieep and makes his escape. Later Laura is discovered by the warden of the prison who in checking up on his many turnkeys finds one of them outside Quest's door in an unconscious condition. Laura gleefully admits that she has helped Quest to escape and encourages the warden "to do his worst" to her.

Detectives are at once sent to watch Quest's home in the hope that he will return. Meanwhile Craig discovers that the muslin which he had half burned in the grate has been removed. He is utterly unstrung by the discovery and when Laura meets him leaving the house soon afterward, he is easily subdued. Laura locks him in the garage of Professor Ashleigh's home and then notifies Quest by pocket wireless. As Quest hurries to her aid two mysterious hands reach out and strangle her. The pistol drops from her lifeless grip and chloroform, poured on her tam-o'-shanter, quickly smothers her. Quest arrives to find both Craig and Lenora gone.

THE BLACK BOX ("The Unseen Terror"—6th Episode—Two Parts—April 12).—Quest paces his room wondering where Laura has been taken. He finally decides to use his pocket wireless, and after sending out several flashes, receives and answer from Lenora. "I don't know where I am," comes the Marconi flashes. "I was outside the garage when I was seized from behind. The 'hands' held me. I was unconscious until I found myself here. I am now in an attic room with no window except the skylight, which I cannot reach. I can see nothing—hear nothing. No one has hurt me, no one comes near me. Food is pushed through a door, which is locked again immediately. The house seems empty, yet I fancy that I am being watched all the time. I am terrified."

Quest reassures Lenora in a few messages and tells her he is doing his best to rescue her. He then goes to the window of his apartment and looks out into the street. Slinking along the other side of the street he sees Craig. The servant enters the ground floor of the apartment house and Quest goes down to trap him. Hiding behind a door, Quest leaps on the servant and at the point of a pistol compels him to come up to his rooms. Quest thereupon uses his powers of hypnosis and throws Craig into a sleep. Just as he is about to obtain an admission from Craig a crackling sound is heard in the hallway and a thin wisp of smoke enters Quest's apartment. Quest learns that the apartment house is a blazing furnace.

Quest reawakens Craig and compels him to descend a rope ladder. Quest then follows, but when he is half way down the rope ladder gives way and Quest barely grasps a telephone cable before the blazing ladder falls into the street. When Quest finally descends the telephone pole to the street he hears Craig telling patrolmen nearby that Quest, who is wanted by Inspector French, is somewhere in the crowd. The police offer a reward for Quest's apprehension, but Quest quickly disguises himself and escapes. He returns to his home and finds the professor worrying over Craig's failure to return. The professor seems more worried over Craig's absence from his petty duties around the house than he does over Laura's disappearance.

He hands Quest a telegram from the sheriff of Bethel, a small town in Connecticut, which reads: "The men you inquire for are both here. They have sold an automobile and seem to be spending the proceeds. Shall I arrest?" Wiring the sheriff to watch the two men, Quest entrains for Bethel at once. The sheriff conducts him to a tough saloon in the slums of the town and points the two men out. Quest at once recognizes the two Gallaghers and pushes open the door of the saloon. Stepping up to Gallagher he taps him on the shoulder and says "You are under arrest." Gallagher's mate fires a shot at Quest and a general stampede follows in the barroom. After a terrific struggle in the barroom in which Quest narrowly escapes death, Gallagher and his mate are finally captured. Meanwhile Laura, in her attic prison, is startled when a boy's baseball smashes the window in her room and then falls at her feet. The ball gives her an idea. She hastily scribbles a note, asking whoever picks up the ball to inform the police headquarters of her imprisonment, attaches the note to the ball and throws it out of the window. The two lads find their ball and take it to police headquarters and fifteen minutes later Inspector French frees her. Quest, the sheriff and their two prisoners return to Quest's home where the central office detective and Professor Ashleigh are still staying. Quest notifies Inspector French that he has found the two thugs and that their confession will serve as an alibi for him. Through the phototelsme Quest sees Laura in Inspector French's office. Inspector French arrives with Laura and Lenora who has been released from prison. After satisfactorily explaining matters to Inspector French, Quest goes to a safe in the room. On the floor of the safe is a small black box inside of which Quest is astounded to find Mrs. Rheinholdt's necklace.

THE BLACK BOX (Installment No. 7—"The House of Mystery"—Two Parts—April 19).—While the Rheinholdt jewels are at last delivered to their owner, Craig, the suspected servant, is hiding in the empty house where Lenora was confined. Meanwhile, Detective Quest is convinced that Craig is in the house and that he cannot have escaped because of the two plainclothes men who have guarded the place ever since Lenora was rescued. Getting the professor and sending Lenora and Laura ahead, Quest approaches the place. "What, is this the house?" The professor gasps with astonishment as he sees the house. "Why, I gave this place to Craig for his old parents when we first came here. They died here three years ago."

Quest leads the search of the house. They have gone through every room when the detective's quick ear catches a sound which the others have missed. Sending the rest downstairs, he fires his gun at the floor just below a linen closet door. On the instant, the door flings open and Craig, white and trembling with fear, falls at Quest's knees. Quest takes him by the collar and drives him down the stairs and sees the professor waiting accusingly below. Craig looks down at Ashleigh, then up to where Quest waits, gun pointed, at the top landing. Then suddenly he inserts one foot in a strap on the stair grasps the bannister firmly and whole center section of stairway turns over, exposing a similar stairway on the underside.

"Quick, the cellar," calls Quest, and they all run downstairs. The professor, winded by the rush of the pursuit, leans heavily against one of the pillars of the foundation as the others open the cellar doors and search the place. "He may go out the front way,' calls Quest, pointing through the open doors, and starts out. Suddenly he changes his mind and calls Laura to take his place while he searches behind some big empty wine barrels.

The girl has hardly approached the cellar doors when a crash of masonry is heard and poor Laura is caught under a ton of cement and stone. The ambulance and the police are called. They arrive and the Inspector's men prepare to search the house, when the house is blown into atoms. But Craig has escaped. When the detective's party went into the cellar, he calmly turned the stairs back to their original position and left the house. In a nearby alley a truck was waiting for him loaded with river pirates who were hired that morning by some mysterious friend of Craig's. Craig escapes to the tramp steamer as he had planned. Stowed away among the bales of cotton, he is fed by a petty officer paid by the river pirates. The steamer is to sail at high tide. Quest, agitated, paces up and own his study. He goes to his humidor to get a cigar. Inside is another of the black boxes with the following note: "In the great scheme of things, the Supreme Ruler of the Universe divided among his children an inheritance; to one, power; to another, strength, but to his favorites, he gave cunning."

Quest thinks. Then he recalls the truckload of river pirates which passed so near the empty house as Quest was standing near the ambulance. His mind is made up at once. Searching through the shipping list, he discovers that the tramp steamer Durham sails for that night. Quest and the professor, accompanied by the Inspector, hire a launch and start for the Durham. But the river pirates expected such a move. Getting Craig's coat and hat, one of their number is dressed to resemble the servant. As Quest's launch approaches the Durham, the launch with the river pirates pulls away and speeds off. Quest sees the supposed Craig and they start in pursuit. The detective's launch is faster, but the other has a good start and it is several minutes before the river pirates' launch is overhauled and the captain ordered to bring Craig out. But the man who steps from the wheelhouse wearing Craig's clothes is not the much-wanted servant, but another riverman by name, Marty O'Toole. As Quest, chagrined, sees that he has been cleverly fooled, the professor touches his shoulder. The Durham is passing the breakwater and putting out to sea.

THE BLACK BOX (Episode No. 8—"The Inherited Sin"—Release week of April 26—Two Parts).—The two Gallaghers receive their sentence for taking the life of the operator at No. 10 Signal Tower and for their attack upon Sanford Quest. The detective and his assistant, Lenora, return from the trial to find that a cablegram has come from Scotland Yard. The cable announces that a man answering to the description of Craig has been found as a stowaway on the Durham, has been arrested and will be taken to Hamblin House for identification. Quest decides to go to England to bring the man back. He also decides to take Lenora along. Quest is curious in regard to Craig's past record and goes to the professor's to learn an account of the servant. The scientist brings out a volume which proves to be a family record of the Craigs. Two pages are of particular interest. "In 1658, Robert Craig, formerly a soldier under Cromwell, became a servitor to Sir Hubert Ashleigh at Hamlin House, Dorset, England." The second page is: "Silas Craig entered service in 1857 as under gamekeeper. He was the first to bring disgrace on the name of Craig. During a drunken brawl he killed his companion, was tried and executed in 1867. John Craig, only son of Silas, entered service in 1880 as valet to Edgar Ashleigh." This evidence gives credence to the belief that Craig inherits a criminal tendency, and the professor feeling that inasmuch as he has had dealings with Craig, decides to go to England.

Laura, badly battered and bandaged up so she can hardly see, but still clinging to her brave cheeriness, is lying in the hospital. "Don't you worry about me," she warns Lenora. "I'll be over on the next boat, none the worse for wear. Our friend, the mysterious fiend, has got to take more than one swipe to put me out of commission." The girls laugh and Lenora hurries off to catch the boat. The trip across the Atlantic is uneventful, and upon their arrival Quest decides it is better for Lenora to remain in London, rather than go to Hamblin House, where bitter memories might make both her and the Ashleighs unhappy.

At Hamblin House, Quest finds that Craig has escaped from the Scotland Yard men. A gamekeeper chasing poachers fired his gun near the road where the Scotland Yard men were driving. Their team ran away. Craig and the officer to whom he was handcuffed were thrown out. The officer was stunned and Craig took advantage of the interval to get his keys and unlock the handcuffs. Dogs were brought, but lost the scent entirely after many false starts, leaving Craig still somewhere in the woods of the Ashleigh estate. The officers, however, did not know the clever trick learned in South Africa by which the servant had escaped. He heard the hounds baying and instantly knew their purpose. Cutting a large bunch of tules, he weaved back and forth in the woods, leaving a plain trail, then doubled back on himself in a way to mystify any pack. Then, his bunch of tules held close about him, their stems in a few inches of water, the servant slipped into the stream and stood silent some fifteen feet from shore, apparently nothing but a bunch of tules growing there. The pack swept by, all at sea, off on a false scent and the servant, with a cynical smile, stepped from the water uncaught.

Determined to see the professor, Craig sneaked to Hamblin House. Dinner is just being served and it is a gay little meal, the twin brothers having been bosom friends since boyhood. Quest is the life of the party with his quick wit and American ways. Lady Ashleigh has quite recovered from the shock of her daughter's terrible death. After dinner, Quest expresses curiosity to see the rambling old home. The gamekeepers on Sir John's great estate are highly amused at the frantic efforts of the Scotland Yard men to find Craig. The head keeper has a theory of his own, but all the satisfaction he will give to the inquisitive innkeeper is a series of knowing nods and winks, and the words, "I've a trap or two set myself. These Yarders haven't all the cunning."

At Hamblin House preparations for the night are in progress. Lady Ashleigh is in her apartment, the butler is locking up all the doors and turning out the gas. In his room Quest cannot keep from his mind tender thoughts of the girl awaiting his return to London. Sir John, more rapid in his disrobing, is already asleep. Quiet settles over the great building. Suddenly, creeping like dead things through the blackness, come two white hands, nearer, nearer. The pale moon watches unmoved as they steal closer, clenching frightfully towards Sir John's throat.

THE COMEBACK (Two Parts—May 2).—Borden, roused to defend the name of a girl whom Sinclair has implicated in a story he has been telling, empties a revolver point blank at the other clubman. He is whisked away in an automobile by Fred Dexter, his cousin, who hides him until he can get out of the country. Sinclair has recovered meanwhile and is plotting revenge. But as Borden refuses to bring before the public the name of the girl, he is unable to vindicate himself. So he goes to New Zealand. Some eight months later, Carr, the city editor of the paper on which he has been employed under an assumed name, calls his attention to a picture in a New York paper remarkably resembling himself. A news item announces that Fred Dexter has identified a man found dead in the woods as his cousin, Richard Borden, missing many months; and Dexter, being next of kin, inherits the fortune of Francis Borden, a South African millionaire, who, in July of the previous year, had died, willing his fortune to Richard Borden. Borden confesses to the editor his identity and the whole story of the shooting. Carr sees in the circumstances a conspiracy. At the time of his uncle's death Borden was crossing the Atlantic. Dexter received the news of the will. He and Sinclair and a third man deliberately arranged for the shooting incident, using blank cartridges, in order to get Borden out of the country. When faced with this theory, the conspirators finally confess. Borden returns to New York and to the girl for whose honor he had sacrificed his happiness. His cousin and his accomplices leave the United States.

HER GRANDPARENTS (May 4).—Dorothy, the girl who presides over the notion counter of the Emporium, the general store in a country town, is the sole support of her aged grandparents, with whom she lives. Her sweetheart, Bob, is the boy-of-all-work in the same store. To the Emporium comes a flashy drummer from the city to sell the merchant a bill of goods. He meets Dorothy, and she is impressed with his good clothes and city manners. Her sweetheart, Bob, lectures her for allowing the drummer to become familiar, and they quarrel but the quarrel is soon forgotten and difficulties adjusted.

In the course of time, the drummer returns on another of his periodical visits. He finds occasion and opportunity to picture to the impressionable girl the allurements of the city. Against her better judgment, she agrees to go with him to the city, where he promised to get her a position in one of the big department stores. She agrees to meet him at the railroad station at train time that night. Evening comes, and she goes to the station, arriving ahead of the drummer. While here waiting for him, she falls asleep and in her dream imagines dire consequences to her grandparents arising out of her support being withdrawn. Her nightmare awakens her and she is about to return home when the drummer arrives. Angered at her change of mind, he attempts to use force, and tries to drag her aboard the then waiting train. Her sweetheart in shadowing the drummer, arrives in the nick of time. A fight ensues in which the drummer is worsted and glad to escape on the moving train.

THE SPELL OF THE POPPY (Two Parts—May 9).—Manfredi, an habitual user of opium, is a piano player in a Chinese cafe. A wealthy tourist becomes interested in the young musician and sends him abroad to study. He promises Zuletta, his common law wife, that on his return he will marry her. Five years later he comes back, still addicted to the drug. Under its spell he is accounted a genius. Failing to make good his promise to Zuletta, he becomes infatuated with Margery Rhodes, a society girl, who comes to study music with him. So strongly is Margery influenced by her teacher, that she also acquires a taste for opium. John Hale, her lover, is in the secret service. Through the revengeful Zuletta he learns that Manfredi conducts an opium joint. Hale has the place raided. He is just in time to save Margery from a fate worse than death.

THANHOUSER.

BIANCA FORGETS (April 27).—Bianca is one of those peculiar girls that no man ever really understands, but what makes her particularly interesting is that young Jarvis thinks he does understand her. His courtship is one of those very peculiar ones that is difficult for anybody to understand. But there are a few things about it on which he himself is in the dark—one of them concerns the identity of a certain Count Berdeau.

The Count and Bianca's father have got a business deal on which serves as an excuse for the Count to call at the Wells' home. Jarvis misunderstands the entire proposition and fails to see the Count's attentions are limited. That's why the Count is yanked away from a ballroom where he has gone for some innocent enjoyment, and is taken before a magistrate, where he is forced to prove with written evidence that he is a gentleman in order to avoid being sent to the cooler as a fugitive criminal. It might have gone bad for Jarvis if the Count knew who to thank for his plight, but the story moves merrily on, aided by the caprices of Bianca. She goes right on juggling hearts, but Jarvis finally puts a finale to the situation by putting a question to Bianca. He gets his answer just about two seconds before the film begins to fade out.

RELIANCE.

THE HOUSE OF BENTLEY (Two Parts—May 1).—When his son John falls in love with Edith Polly, Bentley, Sr., fires his pretty little stenographer. He tells John that he will disown him if he marries below his station financially. Grandma Bentley, however, sympathizes with the broken-hearted young lover. She also meets the girl and is satisfied that Miss Polly really loves John. So Grandma recalls to her son the story of his own romance, and how he and his bride began life together in poverty. Bentley, Sr., lives over his youth, and, realizing that love is the foundation of success, he consents to John's and Edith's marriage.

THE WINNING HAND (April 5).—Tom Fleming had just about reached the end of his rope. Unpaid bills were piling up on his desk. One creditor in particular, Flynn by name, was threatening exposure of an undesirable sort unless his demands were immediately met. Then Fleming chanced to meet Mrs. Moore, a comely young widow with a goodly bank account. The widow and Fleming become engaged. There was a fly in the ointment, however, and that was little Evelyn, daughter of Mrs. Moore. As her prospective father, Fleming, did not meet with her approbation. On one occasion when she entered the parlor as her mother and Fleming were embracing she adopted violence as a means to break off the engagement. Like a fury she pitched into Fleming, kicking him on the shins and belaboring him with her tiny fists until her mother commanded her nurse to take her off to bed.

Flynn, the most persistent of Fleming's tormentors, delivered an ultimatum. He must receive his money by three o'clock the next day. The only solution in sight was immediate marriage with the widow. That evening when he called to take Mrs. Moore to the theater he pleaded with her to make the morrow their nuptial day. The widow refused to hurry the ceremony. When Fleming and Mrs. Moore returned from the theater, a way opened for him. Mrs. Moore removed her jewels and placed them in the writing-desk. A few moments later she left the room. Fleming resolved to risk all and obtain the jewels, for he had become desperate. But he counted without his host. Little Evelyn was hidden away behind the large couch in the library and she was the solitary witness of the theft. She slipped silently out from behind the couch and secured the revolver that her mother kept in the table drawer. She commanded Fleming to hold up his hands. Fleming turned in terror to be confronted by a formidable weapon firmly held in the hands of a little girl. Mrs. Moore entered the room. Evelyn was triumphant and told the story of the robbery with great satisfaction. She has proven her opinions of Fleming to be well grounded in fact. Mrs. Moore's eyes were opened to the true character of the man and she drove her erstwhile fiance from the house.

ADDED FUEL (Two Parts—May 15).—Jane Pepper, reporter for "The Daily Mail," hears her father's and brother's business difficulties are being aired upon "the street," and begs Sim West, rival reporter for "The Express," to print a denial. West makes a scoop and prints the entire scandal.

Jane's father is found mysteriously murdered. Jane's brother has returned home the previous night insensibly drunk, as muddy footprints around the dead man indicates. Other evidence leads to his arrest. No one, however, is able to tell where the father's stolen securities and money have disappeared. The son knows nothing.

West, feeling his news story must have added fuel to the fire, sets about to aid Jane solving the mystery of the theft—the only clue, which will save her brother. Guilt will out, and in this case the guilty butler made his design clear to Jane by the torn bill, the one flaw in his carefully laid plans. Her trap succeeds, although but for the timely arrival of West, Jane might have fallen a victim herself and the ruse of the physician and the detective to wring a confession from the butler been of no avail.

years old, and owner of the ball. A scrimmage ensues and Billy gets the worst of it. He retires to summon reinforcements, sending Teddy to avenge him. Teddy does so to such effect that Jack begs him to call Teddy off—and then vows vengeance. Jack's chance comes unexpectedly that very afternoon. On the beach is Olive, Jack's sweetheart, four years old. Further down the beach is Billy, with his inseparable companions, Teddy, Rover and the baby. Gallant Jack leaves Olive while he goes to buy ice cream. Quite innocently Billy comes up to Olive and makes such a hit that she strolls off with him, with Teddy—Rover and the baby bringing up the rear. When Jack hunts them up, she sends him away: "I like Billy better." Jack scowls with anger. "That fellow is always making trouble for me." What will put Billy in wrong at home? Why, to lose the baby, of course.

Baby Mary, crawling around the rock that moment, offers a not-to-be resisted opportunity. Aided by the tempting ice cream, he enticed baby toward him, then carries her off with the faithful little Rover, to a big box further down the beach, and it becomes tightly locked. He intends to keep the baby there only a minute. Just then mother calls him to go on an errand to buy a loaf of bread. Meantime, Billy and Olive, ready to return home, have noticed that baby is gone. The tide has risen and the box is gently floated off the rocks out to sea. When Jack gets to the beach, he sees the box floating on the water, beyond reach.

While the policeman hunts for baby, followed by Billy and Olive, who trot along behind him as fast as they can, Jack is hiding among the rocks, crying in terror and remorse. The search brings them to Jack, whose tears rouse the policeman's curiosity. The latter makes him confess. Billy hears the confession. It is all simple now. "Go get the box, Teddy," and in Teddy plunges and swims out while the startled policeman runs for a boat, paying no attention to the children. By the time the boat is ready to be launched, Teddy has already reached the box and started for shore. In the excitement of the final rescue and reunion of the children Jack is forgotten.

MOVIE FANS (April 30).—The young clerk had ambitions. He could not believe that he was destined all his life to try and make figures behave. He read of a one time shipping clerk who devoted his time to scenarios, and was drawing down $10,000 a year therefor. The clerk knew he could write better plays than any one else. Much of his leisure time was spent at picture houses, looking at the screen offerings. The pretty young stenographer was certain that the studios needed her to enact the difficult star roles.

One never to be forgotten day, the clerk and the stenographer, who up to this time were strangers, sat side by side in a motion picture house. Each was day dreaming. When a picture flashed out showing "a famous author completing a masterpiece," it seemed to the clerk that the author was himself, and in fancy he became the great man. The girl saw the "Movie Queen" posing for a scene, and in imagination the "Queen" became herself, but, oh, so much more beautiful and artistic than the actress. As they left the theater on their way back to work after their lunch hour, two mutual friends met them, and introduced the clerk to the stenographer. It was a case of love at first sight, and the attraction grew stronger when each confessed the heights to which ambition had led them. In fancy they saw themselves the brilliant attractions of a great studio, the girl starring in the masterpieces written by the brilliant young man, once a poor and unhonored clerk.

They married in time, but their dreams did not come true in the way they had anticipated. The girl had looked for fame—instead she received the earnest love of her devoted partner husband. She had expected large sums of money—and every week she took charge of the small pay envelope of her husband. She had seen herself as a stage star, the recipient of magnificent bouquets—yet more beautiful than any posy was their charming little daughter.

HOME AGAIN (April 25).—Mr. Drummer leaves his wife at home to make a short business trip. On his way to the station he sees a thief take a purse from Mrs. Gardner, who is asleep on a park bench. He gallantly pursues the thief and recovers the purse—but, to his surprise, he is arrested as the guilty one and thrown into jail for sixty days. Mrs. Drummer, lonesome at home, and thinking that hubby has deserted her, decides to rent their home and move to a hotel. She succeeds in leasing the place to Mr. and Mrs. Grinder. Mr. Drummer gets out of jail and has sent word to his wife that he shall soon be home. Mrs. Grinder receives the messenger and tells him to take the note to Mrs. Drummer at the hotel.

Drummer takes on a few drinks before arriving at his home and not knowing that his wife has moved, he enters the house, making a lot of noise, and goes to his room. Grinder is working late at his office. Mrs. Grinder has retired and when she hears Drummer banging around, she thinks that her hubby has come home drunk. Drummer, in pajamas, knocks on his "wife's" door with the idea of squaring himself. The door is opened a few inches and he gets a punch on the head. Grinder returns from the office, tired and worn from labor. He removes his shoes that he may not disturb his wife at such a late hour. Upon seeing the light in her room he decides to kiss her good night. To his surprise he gets a bump on the head with a pitcher.

Drummer peers out of the front room in time to see Grinder move away from the "wife's" door. He now understands why his wife doesn't care to see him—another man has come into her life. He goes to dig out his revolver. Grinder sees Drummer and also suspects his wife. He gets his gun, and a hot time follows as the two deluded men chase one another through the house. Mrs. Grinder joins in the chase, thinking her husband insane. Mrs. Drummer receives her husband's message at the hotel, and realizing that he will return to the old home, she rushes there to head him off. She arrives in time to save Drummer from landing back in jail as a dangerous citizen.

ETHEL'S DISGUISE (Bill Series No. 22—May 2).—A fire-eating Italian is inclined to neglect his wife and to spend most of his time buying wine for Trixie, a chorus girl. The Italian's wife notifies Hadley, her lawyer, that she wishes to have divorce papers served on her husband, as soon as Hadley is able to get evidence against the fickle man.

Hadley instructs Ethel, his stenographer, to disguise herself as a man and follow the Italian to the cafe, and watch his actions. Trixie, the chorus girl, happens to have more than one admirer, and one of these in particular takes her to the cafe. The Italian sees this and almost starts a riot, but the frightened admirer saves his skin by turning Trixie over to Ed, his friend. It so happens now that Ethel, in man's attire, arrives at the cafe and sees Ed with Trixie. (Ed is Ethel's sweetheart.)

Trixie thinks Ethel is a man, and falls in love with her. Ethel keeps up the flirtation in order to get even with Ed. Things turn about in such a way that the Italian, upon entering the cafe, sees his adorable Trixie in Ethel's company. A quarrel starts and Ethel's identity is disclosed to Ed. He comes to her assistance and Ethel has the pleasure of serving a summons on the Italian.

Minusa Gold Fibre Screens

"BUILT BY BRAINS"

Buying a Minusa Screen from the company E. R. Anderson is with is like buying a telephone from Alexander Graham Bell, or an incandescent bulb from Thomas A. Edison. These men had the original idea. They saw the first vision. They still see into the future of their products, a half century ahead of their imitators, for their's is the prophetic gift. If Edison told you how to make his Mazda, your process would be out of date in sixty days. He would always see ahead of and beyond you. So it is in the world of projection screens with E. R. Anderson. The gold fibre screen he made years ago is not comparable with his Minusa Gold Fibre. The method of a year ago has been made obsolete by Anderson's vision and Chas. Hetzel's chemical progressiveness. The screen we make now will doubtless be greatly improved before many moons have waned.

But when improvements come you won't have to throw your Minusa away. Send it to us for full credit and you will get the newest and best. All improvements belong to the purchaser of our screen. Our name for this is Screen Service.

If you buy a screen from some company who doesn't control Anderson's foresight or Hetzel's genius, that screen will some day go to the ash heap. If you do not buy a Minusa now, you will eventually.

We are not selling trade-marks bought at auction as ladies buy bargains. We sell screens "Built by Brains" to fit your theatre.

ONE SUMMER'S SEQUEL (Two Parts—May 3).—The summer boarders have all left farmer Gill's New England farm, but two of them, Lloyd Norman and his cousin, Edgar, are ever in the thoughts of the farmer's daughter Mary. She dare not think what will happen if a promise given a short time ago is not kept. Daily she awaits the summons which would make her heart glad, but it never comes, until at last she realizes that she must face the world alone, an outcast, for she knows her Puritanical father and mother would consider her indiscretion as the "one unforgivable sin."

On their return to the city, the cousins, Lloyd and Edgar, take up the routine of their daily existence, soon forgetting the country girl who had entered their lives for a few short weeks. The memories of the days that are past soon fade from the thoughts of Lloyd Norman and he becomes infatuated with Janet Moore, while Edgar looks forward to a life of happiness with Janet's cousin Dorothy. A double wedding is arranged, of which Mary hears and tries to prevent. Edgar, meeting her at the door, persuades her to wait until after the weddings, when he promises to compensate her in her trouble. After Lloyd's marriage to Dorothy, he devotes much of his time to business and his complaining wife, to fill her life, adopts an orphan, of which her husband becomes insanely jealous and obsessed with the idea that the child is an illegitimate offspring of her own. He finally accuses her and Dorothy, to test his love, lyingly admits that his thoughts are true. As Lloyd orders his wife from the house, Edgar enters and when he is told of his cousin's decision he informs him that his wife has lied because the child is the illegitimate child of his own, whom Edgar has been instrumental in providing a future, out of sympathy for the girl Lloyd has wronged. The horror-stricken husband appeals to his wife to forgive him, but the fact that he has driven her out of his house on account of a sin of which he was guilty makes her detest his actions, and she leaves him to expiate his sin alone.

WHEN EMPTY HEARTS ARE FILLED (May 5).—Paul Latham and his wife, Nancy, live in a small fishing village and by careful saving, not only own their home, but have purchased a fishing boat. One day their happy existence receives a severe shock. Paul meets with an accident which leaves him a cripple for life and in his helplessness decides to end it all by suicide. He is prevented by Nancy, who has found, strapped to a hatch, a three-year-old child evidently washed ashore from some wreck. Unable to trace the boy's identity, his presence brings a new interest into the cripple's life and his wife prays that the child will never be taken from them.

Three years pass by, and little Tom has grown to be a sturdy boy of six when Paul's heart is again made empty by reading a newspaper article stating that a Mr. and Mrs. Bayly, whose child was lost in the wreck of the Oceanic on Jan. 20, 1910, were stopping at a nearby hotel. The article also stated that the child had been strapped to a hatch by the nurse, but that no trace has ever been found of the boy. Paul consults his diary, where he finds an entry under date of Jan. 20, 1910, reading, "Nancy found a baby boy washed ashore on the beach," and, feeling sure that little Tommy is Mrs. Bayly's child, it is decided to let the parents know that their child is alive. This heart breaking duty performed, Paul's life becomes a misery to him, awaiting the arrival of the people who are to take the child away. When the child is presented to the Bayly's the anxious parents declare that their child was a girl, and Paul's empty heart is again filled with joy, which remains until his death.

BEAUTY.

THE FACE MOST FAIR (May 4).—Billy Stanhope, on a visit to his old friend, Bob Larkin, is informed by the hotel clerk that Bob has been called out of town for the day. As he is passing the time away in the hotel lobby, he is attracted by a young woman, whom he learns by inquiring is Edith Van Norris. In a spirit of adventure, Billy finds out her address and starts for her home, but on the way sprains his ankle in avoiding the auto of Dr. Stoddard and is taken to a hospital, where, to his astonishment and joy, he finds that his nurse is to be none other than the girl he had set out to find.

Billy enjoys himself so much at the hospital that when the doctor informs him that he will be out in two days he decides to find some way to remain. He sends for his friend Bob and, getting him to smuggle in something to eat, pretends that he has lost his appetite. He also acquires a feverish appearance by violent exercise behind locked doors. These "symptoms" of sickness alarm his nurse, who sends for the doctor in a hurry, but that wise man soon discovers the deception and also the cause of it. The doctor decides that a homely old nurse would soon make Billy well. This proves to be true, but not until the new attendant has discovered his supply of food hidden beneath the pillow. Having been pronounced cured and sent home, Billy returns to the hospital, hoping to find Edith. Here he learns that she has left without giving an address.

Billy becomes downhearted. To cheer him up Bob takes him to a party given by his aunt, and while there Billy, wandering disconsolately about the grounds, again meets Edith, resulting in their both discovering that they are suffering from a lasting attack of love-sickness.

DREAMS REALIZED (May 7).—James Grey, an actor, and his daughter, Helen, are introduced to Count Vernay at the theatre and a supper follows, at which the nobleman shows them a photograph of his "ancestral home" in Italy. Following the supper party, Grey informs his daughter that the Count would be an ideal match. Helen has other views and Frank Adams, a poor, but worthy, young man, in his bachelor rooms, dreams of the time when his fondest hopes will be realized and Helen will share his home.

The Count is attracted by Helen's beauty and asks her father for her hand, which is considered an honor by the proud actor. Following the Count's departure he dreams of the days when surrounded by his daughter and her children he has retired to a life of luxury in Italy, but his visions of the future are rudely broken by the entrance of Helen, who informs him that she intends to marry Frank Adams. Her father cannot understand why she should choose a marriage of love instead of a brilliant future, but, as Helen is determined, her obstinate father declares that he will disown her if she will not follow his wishes.

However, the lovers are united and their dream of happiness is realized, although Grey refuses to recognize them. Disappointment and drink soon drive Grey into the downward path and the day comes when there is nothing left for him but the poorhouse. As he reluctantly applies for admission he is taken to the office of the manager, where he is surprised to find his son-in-law in charge of the asylum. Thinking that he will be refused admittance, he is about to retrace his steps when his daughter enters and asks him to share their home. The old man, forgiving the past, accepts, and is taken home where, surrounded by the love of his daughter, her husband and their children, his dream of long ago is realized.

The newcomer thanks Pasquale and tells him that he will go through hell for him. The saloon keeper, seeing in this man a dangerous rival for the love of Emma, pretends to send him after some horse thieves. The Man From Nowhere, however, has begun to distrust the Mexican and insists upon his accompanying him into the desert. While his companion sleeps, Pasquale hides the water bags in the sand, and lets the horses loose. The stranger, realizing that both of them cannot get back alive, gives up his chance because of the debt he believes he owes Pasquale. But the Mexican fails to find his cache, and in drinking from a poisoned spring, gets his death. The stranger discovers the half-buried water bags and arrives at Snake River City. sailors to close the hatch. Ned is thus imprisoned and is unable to interfere for the remainder of the voyage.

The steamer reaches New York and Blye gives instructions for the release of Ned. Then with June and the rest of the party, Blye goes ashore. As June, Blye and the others of the Blye party leave the pier and are about to enter their autos, Bill Wolf, Mrs. Blye's detective, rushes up. Blye knocks Wolf down and drives away. Wolf follows in a taxicab. He trails the entire party to a large building whose roof and some of whose sides are of glass. He then hurries to report to Mrs. Blye. When Ned comes out of the hold he is able to find no trace of June or Blye. Thinking that he may gain some information at Mrs. Blye's house he hurries there. He arrives in time to hear Bill Wolf tell Mrs. Blye of the large glass building and Blye's presence there. Mrs. Blye and Wolf start for the large building while Ned follows in another machine. On the way Ned sends a telegram to Mr. and Mrs. Moore, June's parents, explaining the situation. The Moores start at once to assist Ned in his rescue of June.

Ned finds a sturdy doorkeeper at the large glass building and fights with him to get in. Detective Wolf, who arrives on the scene with Mrs. Blye, assists Ned in his struggle with the doorkeeper. The two overpower the guardian of the entrance and force their way into the hallway of the building. Ned finds a locked door at the end of the hallway barring further progress. Peering through an opening of the door Ned sees that June, Blye and others are in the room. As Ned watches, June, Blye and his associates go into another room. Ned breaks down the door, but finds that the only egress, however, is through another barred door. The Moores arrive on the scene in time to see Ned breaking down the second door.

Ned, the Moores, Mrs. Blye and Bill Wolf force their way into the presence of Blye, June and the others. The Blye party is grouped about Edwards, who is seated at a small table and is handling money to the various members of the group, in turn. As Edwards hands some money to June, Ned seizes Blye. Cunningham and the other men of the party separate the two and then explain the situation to Ned. The building in which they are, Blye tells Ned, is a moving picture studio. When June left her husband in order not to be financially dependent upon him she joined the motion picture company of Blye. The many strange adventures through which she passes and which mystifies the Moores and Ned, Blye explains, were scenes in various motion picture dramas in which June was leading woman. June has now won her independence and her contract with Blye has been fulfilled. Edwards is paymaster and was paying salaries. Ned is at last convinced and makes very humble apology to June. June forgives him and introduces him formally to Blye and the other members of the company. Everybody joins in a big farewell dinner to June and Ned. The situation has been explained to Mrs. Blye and she forgives her husband for his seeming disloyalty. June and Ned are toasted at the dinner and at its end resume their interrupted honeymoon.

The train bringing the sister and her baby East is wrecked by a collision with another train just outside the town where Sam lives, and Sam himself goes to help rescue the survivors. The sister, fatally injured, prevails on a minister to christen the baby before her death, and Sam is pressed into service as godfather. The minister promises to take the baby safely to its grandfather's home.

Impressed by this incident, Sam buys a Bible, and defends himself from the taunts of the "boys" when accused of "pulling freight for Heaven" and becoming a "child of God." Interest in his god child leads him to take a trip East to see it. On his arrival he finds himself in the home of Frances, who has just accepted Chet. Sam and Chet immediately clash over Frances, and when Sam learns that Chet is using the mortgage as a club he kicks the bounder out. This done, he assures Frances, who has shown that she loves him, that he will take care of the mortgage and of her, too.

THE MYSTERIOUS AIRSHIP—(Ideal—Two Parts—April 26).—The mutilated body of a man has been found near Durnkrut. Jules Brandt, the detective, is informed at the same time of a mysterious airship which comes and goes. He resolves to stay in the village on the border of the forest. The next time the airship appears he gives chase after telephoning M. Charles Illner, the Austrian aviator, who joins in and they follow the airship to its shed. There Brandt learns of the sudden disappearance of a young American, James Stirner. He is shown a picture of Stirner which is that of the mutilated man. He visits Stirner's villa and finds a torn bit of paper containing these words: "I cannot bring myself to do it—and I beseech you not to disturb the peace and quiet of our home." The detective introduces himself to the aeronaut's wife, Marie Weyer, and gives her to understand the nature of his investigations. Terrified, she confesses to him that unwelcome attentions had been paid her by Stirner after her marriage to the aeronaut. Hoping that the wealthy young American would finance the building of the airship, she had written him that she would visit him to plead her cause. She did not go, but the American held the letter over her head after as a threat. When the airship was completed, Stirner jumped aboard with the aeronaut and his wife and later, when her husband was busy with the rudder, he rushed at Marie, whose screams were drowned by the sound of the machinery. The pair struggled. Stirner lost his balance and fell. Max saw nothing of the tragedy. At the completion of the story the detective expressed his sympathetic understanding by leaving the young woman and her husband undisturbed.

On his arrival, Fred learns that Jack, his brother, has been shot by Jay, the defeated candidate, and he determines to track the criminal. On returning to tell Lillian of it, he finds Jay, who proves to be Lillian's brother. Lillian pleads for Jay. Fred promises not to kill him, but makes Lillian telephone the deputy. The deputy learns, en route, that Jack was not killed after all, so the final reckoning is left to Jack. Jay goes to the hospital to take his punishment, and is forgiven by Jack. After her father's sudden death on the eve of her marriage, Ethel is left destitute when it is proclaimed by the lawyer that no will had been left and that Ethel cannot prove her blood relationship to her father. Ethel becomes a governess. While airing her charge in the park one day, the child discovers a revolver and a piece of paper which proves to be her father's will. The sweetheart of the ward enlists the aid of a beautiful young woman, to make love to the two Dutchmen, and make them jealous, with the hope that in their anger they will kill each other, thus leaving the sweethearts free to marry. CAN A MAN FOOL HIS WIFE (Cameo—April 29).—Uncle Dudley, the genial fixer, who always manages to get in worse than anybody else, is very anxious to cut up a few capers, and is aided in so doing by a prearranged telegram to his home while he and his wife are dining, instructing a big deal ahead and his immediate presence in a neighboring village. With hypocritical apology, Dudley starts for his sky-lark and gets into a highly ludicrous series of complications at the Ginkville Hotel, with two soubrettes, a drummer and his wife, and a very temperamental jam and preserves salesman. To Dudley's further embarrassment, his friend is extremely late for his appointment and does not arrive until Dudley's suspicious wife establishes herself in the next room to her husband and spies upon his errantry. Dudley, finding himself in deeper water than he can scheme out of, attempts to make his escape, but falls into the wrathful clutches of his spouse. The result—he is yanked home by his ear amid the guffaws of the other guests of the hostelry.

She takes him home, and while telling his life's history they are interrupted by the maid who brings in a bundle from a department store marked C. O. D. for $50. Explaining that she is short of money she asks him to lend her fifty. A little later another package comes C. O. D. for $100. He feels uneasy, but before he is able to leave he hears a man's voice. His new friend explains that it is her jealous husband, and then locks him in a closet. Scared to death, he is told that if he gives up $500, he will be left alone by the husband. He gladly agrees, leaves the house by a window and starts back to the farm. His sweetheart appears, tickling the sleeping lad with a twig, and he wakes to find that it was all a dream and that his money is still in his pocket. He decides that farm life is far better than the chances of a large city for a farmer lad.

They get married, and are one of the "few" couples in this world who do not "live happily ever after." He tries to keep her love, and she to wreck his credit. He can't keep her love without losing his honor, so he chooses to lose his honor. He "borrows" a large sum of money from the bank in which he is cashier, risks it on a long-shot in a horse race—and wins. He then plays the stock market—and wins again. But the bank examiners are coming in the morning and the borrowed money must be returned to the locked vault before daylight. The girl has a brother who was once "shady," but has since beaten his way back to decency. They play HIM—and win again. But the brother doesn't win. He has to kill a man to save his sister's and her husband's names, and he again becomes a fugitive from justice. Forced by the vigilance of the law to live under cover, he gets his living by night in the easiest way. But they finally get him. His obvious guilt is undeniable His dream of honor finds its fulfillment in a criminal's cell. The other two are left to the torture of their accusing consciences. Who Pays?

MAX BRAVES THE BRINY (April 26—May 1).—Max's magnetic personality pleases a charming young lady who doesn't object to his enamoured kiss 'till she's sure she has it. The young lady's maiden aunt, however, remembering happier times, and maddened at the thought of what might have been, enters and breaks up the tete-a-tete. Max wanders off, disconsolate, but irrepressible, and comes to a dock where a launchman offers to take him aboard a private yacht. He fortifies himself, liquidly, against seasickness, and when he reaches the yacht is a "perfeck-genelm'n," with strong democratic leanings as is proven by his gravely offering to kiss the second mate. His hat has a will of its own, with a penchant for blowing off, and Max follows it down a smoke-stack, from which he emerges sooty but triumphant. A small salute cannon next attracts his attention, and he selects the rear part of a sailor's white breeches for a target. He is appalled at the impending slaughter, but he knows that his country expects every man to do his duty, and he must fire when he sees the whites of the foes' pants. One shot brings the enemy down. Max is victorious, but unassuming, as becomes a man who has swept to victory with a single blow. He is next attracted by a sailor giving semaphore signals from the rail of the ship. Sailor down, Max up, then—Max down. Picture fades out with Max suspended in mid-air on the hooks of the ship's anchor, imitating a flying-fish.

PHYSICAL TRAINING IN THE FRENCH ARMY (April 26—May 1).—In this day of war and bloodshed we are prone to give too little thought to the making of the soldier and too much to his demise. Here is an opportunity to see more of the former. The splendid physical condition of the French army at the front is due in no small measure to the rigid training through which the soldiers pass. Many phases of this training are here shown including gymnastics, fencing and dancing. Let your patrons see these timely pictures.

SICILY IN STORM AND CALM (On Same Reel As Foregoing).—Ever and anon, the white-capped billows, driven on by the gale, hurl themselves against the rock-bound coast of Sicily, the world-famed beauty spot of the Mediterranean. It is an inspiring sight to see the restless waves, wind-tossed, glinting and flashing brilliantly in the moonlight. Though the seas run high and the spray drives far, the fishermen laboriously make their way to the fishing grounds. We envy them the sight when the clouds break and the sun's rays flash through, presenting a wonderful panorama of cloud effects.

THE NEW EXPLOITS OF ELAINE (Episode No. 4, "The Vengeance of Wu Fang"—Two Parts).—With Elaine in his power, Wu Fang decides on a vengeance more fiendish than he had ever before contemplated. He releases Elaine, telling her that her ultimate punishment will be more frightful than any bodily injury he can now inflict. Slowly, and one by one, he tells her, her dearest friends will die, while she will live on in dread apprehension of a fate that will ultimately overtake her. He then places an African Tick, an insect, whose bite means certain death by a lingering fever, in the 'phone receiver in Kennedy's laboratory. Two fake calls are enough to infect both Jameson and Kennedy, and the malignant fever is working in their blood. A specialist is called in who recognizes the symptoms, and prepares the only drug known to counteract this fatal fever. Wu Fang, seeing that he is about to be foiled, intercepts the specialist's message for a nurse, and sends instead a woman of the underworld to carry out his design. This is to infect whatever instruments the doctors are going to use on Kennedy and Jameson, with a virulent poison. His second failure he must needs credit to Elaine, who, arriving at Kennedy's apartment, and seeing Weepy Mary in the guise of a nurse, immediately denounces her to the company as a notorious criminal. Weepy Mary makes her escape in the excitement, and Elaine is installed as nurse of the men to whom she owes her life many times over.

A MODERN MAGDALEN (Five Parts).—Unhappy surroundings and cruel parents force Katinka Jenkins to lead a very dissatisfied existence. The mill foreman becomes attracted by her, and makes advances which Katinka resents. Joe Mercer, a worker, is in love with Katinka, but the desperate girl chooses Lindsay, the rich mill owner. The girl's father, in order to obtain a petty loan, promises his daughter's hand to Joel Brinker, a money lender, who forces his attentions until Katinka leaves home. Katinka, ignorant of the fact that Lindsay is already married, proceeds to live a gay and reckless life, never forgetting, however, to send her family enough money to live on. Later, through Lindsay's influence, Katinka becomes the famous "Madcap" dancer. A reform movement, headed by John Strong, is started, in order to stop Katinka's disgraceful performances. Katinka's extravagance forces Lindsay to borrow money in order to pay the mill hands' wages. Ignorant of Lindsay's financial condition, Katinka continues her reckless living. The men demand their wages, and a strike at the mill is barely averted.

Believing John Strong, who has fallen in love with her sister, Olivia, to be a reformer in name only, Katinka invites him to join a gay party which is given by Lindsay in her honor. Strong is at first shocked, but the gaiety of the occasion, and Katinka's hospitality towards him, soon makes him forget the real purpose of his visit. The mill owner is unexpectedly called away as the strikers, on the verge of riot, are only held back by Joe Mercer's great influence with them. As Strong is making desperate love to Katinka, Olivia and her father enter, and Strong is then shown up in his true colors. After all the others have gone, Brinker, who is also a guest at the party, remains and tells Katinka of Lindsay's financial condition, at the same time telling her of his great love for her. Remorseful, Katinka orders Brinker out of her home, and for the first time realizes how much her reckless life has cost.

Joe Mercer learns of Katinka's affair with Lindsay. Losing control of himself, he returns and arouses the workers to riot. They attack Lindsay as he is leaving the mill. Lindsay's wife leaves him, and later the mills are destroyed by fire which makes his ruin complete. The unhappy Katinka learns of the life she has wrecked. Remorseful, she decides to end her misspent life by suicide. This is prevented by Joe Mercer. After strong persuasion, Katinka promises to reform, and become a nurse in the United States Army. Joe also enlists. Her reformation becomes complete when she shows great bravery in the yellow fever camp. Joe has been stricken with the disease and is aided to recover by Katinka, who at last realizes that love from the poor is far better than luxuries from the rich.

feels an uncontrollable impulse stealing over him to perform some act of lawlessness or violence. The dual personality has its inception, and Judge Legarde, with distorted countenance and the carriage of a thief, suddenly becomes metamorphized into a being of the underworld. He steals out of his house, and on his ramblings through the city, ultimately finds himself the habitue of a den known as the "Lame Duck." Each night this same impulse steals over him, and each morning finds him unconscious at his desk, restored to his original personality. He endeavors to fight off and battle with this evil influence, but without avail.

Several thefts and acts of violence occur in the city, which the police authorities are unable to settle upon any one man, but of all these, Judge Legarde is the moving spirit. Allying himself with this band of denizens of the underworld, he becomes infatuated with Amelia, a girl of bewitching beauty, who at the time when Judge Legarde was presiding over his court, was sentenced by him to prison for the theft of a necklace from Miss Caverly, whose maid she was at one time. Amelia meets Legarde in "The Lame Duck" and there charges him with being Judge Legarde. Under the influence of the dual personality he cannot recognize the truth of the accusation, and the girl and the other habitues of the place, impressed by his vehement denial, fail to pursue the subject. He plans a robbery of his own home with the air of "Big Charles" and others. "The Quill," a stool pigeon of the police, reveals the plan of the contemplated theft. They arrive at Judge Legarde's house just at the moment that Big Charles and his pals attempt to escape, and when Judge Legarde undergoes the transformation from the thief to his former good self.

Miss Caverly and her father are under the belief that over work an dattention to his professional duties are the causes of his strange lapses of memory which Judge Lagarde is subjected to, but never suspecting the real truth. Miss Caverly's marriage to Judge Legarde is deferred until his complete restoration to health. Caverly engages, without Legarde's knowledge, the services of an eminent brain specialist who undertakes to eradicate the dual personality, and at a time when the good personality is about to pass away and the evil one to find its inception, the specialist merges the two into one, finally restores Judge Legarde to permanent health. His marriage to Miss Caverly is consummated.

THE UNBROKEN ROAD (Five Parts).—John Radford becomes the guardian of Constance Turner. Radford's political ambitions cause him to neglect his ward, who possesses a secret love for him. Walter Dover, the son of a political boss, accompanies his father to Radford's town, where he meets Constance, with whom he falls in love. The attachment is opposed by Radford, but Constance stinging under his indifference, resents any interference. Constance is persuaded to elope with Walter Dover. At a road house she learns of his purpose and leaves him. She is overtaken by a storm and injured by a falling tree. She returns to her home but Radford casts her out, believing that she has sinned with young Dover, who again seeks her out, receives the girl's forgiveness and promises immediate marriage. Constance is easily persuaded by Walter, who seeks his father's consent to marry her, but this is refused. Not wishing to lose her, Walter has a mock marriage performed.

Radford, in the meantime, has advanced politically, and is informed by Walter's father that he has picked him out as the nominee of his party for Governor. A letter, written by a friend of Walter's who participated in the mock marriage, is found by Constance, and for the first time she learns of Walter's duplicity. Constance informs Walter's father of her relationship with his son. The political boss dispatches Walter abroad, and plans to get Constance out of the way to avoid publicity. As the result of schemes hatched, Constance is convicted of a crime of which she is entirely innocent. Radford is elected Governor.

Constance, now confined in prison, becomes the object of interest of a prison charity worker who seeks her pardon. At an interview between the prisoner and the Governor, Radford recognizes Constance. Radford pardons her against the protests of the political boss, Dover, which causes the first eruption between Dover and Radford. Radford seeks renomination as Governor and is opposed by Dover, who seeks to get rid of Constance through a bribe, which is refused. Constance meets Charles Garvan, a political leader and rival of Dover, and, knowing his power, seeks to have him allay himself with the Governor in the matter of renomination. Becoming infatuated with Constance, Garvan refuses unless Constance accepts his advances, which she refuses. To help the Governor politically, she offers to present her story of the wrongs committed by young Dover to the world, but Radford refuses to permit this.

Learning of the Governor's sure defeat for renomination, she again goes to Garvan and accepts his proposition. At a crucial moment in the convention when Garvan is about to throw his votes supporting Radford, Walter, who has returned, goes to Constance and endeavors to force his attentions upon her. A struggle ensues, which causes the overturning of a stove, burning the convention hall and injuring Walter. The Governor saves Walter and Constance from death, although the burns received by Walter ultimately prove fatal. His death bed confessions completely exonerate Constance.

Radford, at the adjourned convention, is renominated for Governor. Garvan endeavors to hold Constance to her promise, but the Governor makes him realize that if he takes her under those conditions, she could never love him. Garvan realizes that his love for Constance is clean and pure and accepts her in marriage as his wife.

THE JUGGERNAUT (Vitagraph—Five Parts—April 19).—Philip Hardin, a dissipated, good-natured son of a millionaire, and John Ballard, working his way through college, form a friendship. Young Hardin, because of his dissolute habits, gets behind in his studies and Ballard acts as a special tutor. In one of his many lapses from study, Hardin becomes embroiled in a fight which occurs in a gambling den and is rescued by Ballard, who happens to be passing. During the fight Ballard floors one of the gamblers, "Red" Curley, who tried to shoot Hardin. A newspaper report of Curley's death frightens the two students and they agree to keep their part in the fight secret.

At the end of their college course, Hardin's father places him in the shops of the N. Y. & V. C. R. R., of which he is vice-president, but his bad habits still cling and he is discharged by the foreman. His father gives him another chance, promising a home and a comfortable allowance if he will marry and settle down, intimating that Viola Ruskin, the daughter of a personal friend, would be acceptable as a daughter-in-law. John Ballard, on leaving college, studies law and soon becomes one of the rising young men of the day. He meets and falls in love with Viola, and, although his love is returned, Mrs. Ruskin compels her daughter, because of financial reasons, to accept the attentions of Hardin. The sudden death of Hardin's father influences Mrs. Ruskin to hurry the marriage.

A year after a daughter comes to them and the little girl's advent changes Hardin into a man of action. Through his money and influence he works his way up to the presidency of the N. Y. & V. C. R. R. John Ballard also becomes a power by his election to the office of District Attorney. There have been numerous fatal wrecks on Hardin's road and, yielding to the insistent demands for an investigation, Ballard calls on his old college chum and tries to persuade him to do something for its betterment. Unable to move the railroad president, Ballard threatens legal proceedings and the officers of the road are brought to court. The night before the trial, Hardin remembers the college episode and threatens Ballard with exposure as a murderer unless he stops the prosecution. The District Attorney yields to the threat, and the trial is taken off the calendar. On his return from court, Hardin receives a letter from one of his former gambling friends, who had been a witness of the fight, stating that "Red" Curley had been killed in a later fracas. Hardin refuses to do anything about the letter, but his wife, still admiring Ballard, takes the letter and, rushing to the home of the District Attorney, arrives just in time to prevent a tragic scene.

Later, Ballard, determined to get proof of the conditions, sends one of his clerks to get a position on the railroad so as to make a personal investigation. Hardin, wishing some proxies, which are in a safe at his country home, 'phones his wife to get them. The auto in which she is hurrying to her husband, breaks down and she is compelled to flag the express, wiring her husband of the fact. In the meantime Ballard's clerk has discovered rotten ties and loose rails on a bridge and wires Hardin of its condition. The telegram from his wife and the one telling of the dangerous bridge reach Hardin about the same time. Realizing the oncoming express on which his wife is riding must cross the weakened bridge, he hurries by automobile and motorboat to try and head off the train. Coming in view of the bridge as the flyer hits the rotten ties, he sees the train crash through into the waters of the river below. The sight was too much for his over-wrought nerves, and he falls over dead. Viola, unconscious is taken from the wreck by John Ballard, who happened to be near the scene of the accident, and, while carrying her to a farmhouse comes upon the body. Laying her on the arm of the man who was her husband, he watches her as she succumbs to the shock brought on by the juggernaut of fate.

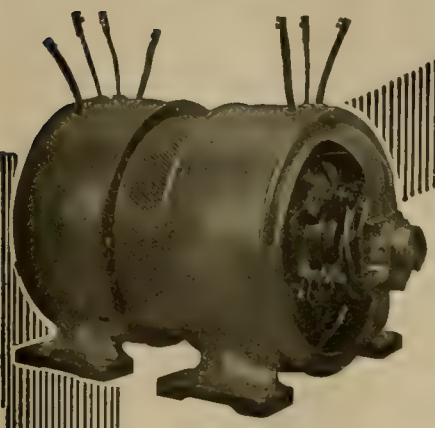
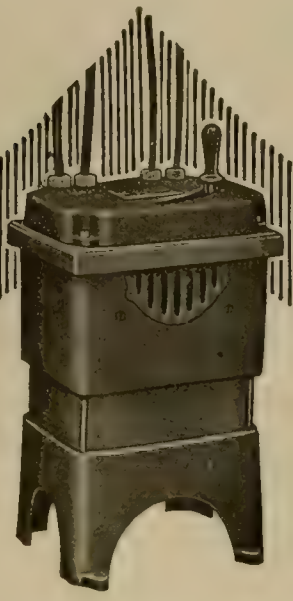
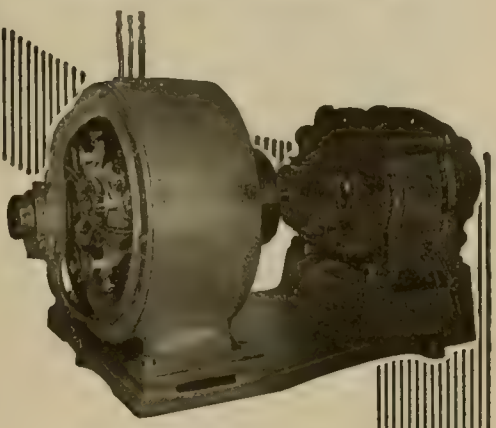
BETTER LIGHT LESS CURRENT



The DC Compensarc lowers the voltage of a direct current supply to that required at the lamp without needless waste.



The AC Compensarc cuts ⅔ from your lighting bill if you use alternating current.



The AC to DC Compensarc will transform alternating into direct current and reduce the voltage at the same time without needless waste.

No matter what current you have---Alternating or Direct---or what voltage or frequency, one of the will enable you to secure a light that will give those clear, bright pictures that everybody now demands.

What's the use of paying extra money for special screens, projecting machines, and first run films and then spoil the whole result with poor light? With the Fort Wayne Compensarcs you can get any kind of light you want regardless of the kind or quality of your current supply.

The Compensarcs will give you

STEADY LIGHT. No flickering, no sputtering, even when changing intensities or from one machine to another.

WHITE LIGHT. No yellow streaks, no ghosts.

BRIGHT LIGHT. Three times the light with two-thirds the current.

They are safe, efficient, easy to operate, fool proof and reliable.

Do not let flossy "ads," reckless promises and unknown management lead you to purchase a screen that you must very soon discard. You are the one who must necessarily suffer. It's your business and your money at stake. These so-called screen manufacturers do not pay your bills. "It's up to you to sink or swim."

Stockton's Scriptwriting Service

To aid those who wish to guard against the formation of bad writing habits, or who wish to estimate their progress, I offer the following service:

Script Criticism For a fee of two dollars for each reel, I will read your manuscript and write a personal letter, pointing out the faults of plotting, technical development, manuscript preparation, etc. Sometimes I can help you to make the script salable, but I do not guarantee a sale. I do not revise manuscript; I do not typewrite it, nor do I offer it for sale. I simply write you a letter that tells you what the trouble is.

Plot Estimates If your stories do not sell and you want to know why, send me five synopses and one full script. I will criticise the script and tell you whether it is your plot or your development that is wrong. The fee for this service is $5 for the five synopses and additional plot. Synopses must not run more than 300 words each. Send a synopsis of your undeveloped plot and fee of one dollar and you will be advised as to whether it will pay you to develop the same.

Please Note My fees do not include envelopes or return postage. Send prepaid and self addressed return envelope and remit in New York exchange; not local checks. I reserve the right to return unread (with fee) any story or plot that does not warrant treatment. All scripts must be typewritten.

How to Make Money

by Lewis J. Selznick

No. 15

This series of articles is planned to make money for you—to show you why my ideas have succeeded—and why they will succeed for you if you will weigh each one carefully. Some of them will sound egotistical. I want them to—it's the only way I can drive home my arguments.

The single reel comedies produced by the World Comedy Stars Film Corporation have back of them some of the strongest names in the amusement world.

RICHARD CARLE, whose name is known all over the country as a result of his successes on the legitimate stage in "The Mayor of Tokio," "The Spring Chicken," "The Tenderfoot" and "The Doll Girl."

TOM WISE, beloved for his work in "A Gentleman from Mississippi," and now in "The Song of Songs," and many other hits.

KATHRYN OSTERMAN, recently starred in "A Persian Garden" and "Piff, Paff, Pouff."

JEFF DE ANGELIS, starred in "Fantana" and "The Beauty Spot."

LULU GLASER, famous as "Dolly Varden," "The Madcap Duchess" and "Dolly Dollars."

FLORENCE TEMPEST, the most fascinating boy in vaudeville, noted for her work with Tempest and Sunshine.

PAULA EDWARDES, who is remembered for her playing in "Winsome Winnie" and "The Princess Beggar."

And now the further announcement that WEBER & FIELDS, the world's greatest comedians, are to be starred in one reel features.

HERE ARE MAGIC NAMES WITH WHICH TO DRAW BIG AUDIENCES.

Here is the opportunity to add at small expense a one-reel comedy feature which will have the pulling power of Broadway stars and the biggest reputations in the world of comedy.

These comedies are clean, wholesome and full of laughs.

There is no better way to strengthen an ordinary program than to add and advertise one of these features. For a house that makes a specialty of feature programs, there is no program stronger than a World Feature followed by a World Comedy Stars film.

Every exhibitor, no matter how small his house—whether he can afford to run a big five-reel picture or not—can afford to run a World Comedy Star one reel feature and use the big name it represents, to give his house the atmosphere of tone and strength that big names always give.

Here is one good way for the live exhibitor to make money—to realize full houses with a very small investment.

ALL THESE MAGNIFICENT FEATURES ARE INCLUDED IN YOUR REGULAR WEEKLY UNIVERSAL PROGRAM FOR WEEK OF MAY 10TH

King Baggot's Marvelous Dual Impersonation, THE CORSICAN BROTHERS, Imp, 3 reel drama

Founded on Alexander Dumas' masterpiece of fiction, this picture simply pulses with life and atmosphere. It is King Baggot's finest effort by far and he is splendidly supported by Jane Gail and a company of exceptional strength. A production far ahead of the "lemonade" so often handed exhibitors under the "Feature" label and a big drawing card for any theatre wide awake enough to grab at a good thing.

UNIVERSAL

Wellington Playter and Marie Walcamp in THE TORRENT, a triumph of thrilling realism. Gold Seal, 2 reels

This, the finest outdoor feature picture ever produced at Universal City, is one of the biggest thrillers ever shown on the screen. In the great scene of the bursting dam, a huge reservoir containing over 12,000,000 gallons of water was emptied in one wild flood with an effect which is simply stupendous. The dramatic story is magnificently interpreted by both principals and the whole effect is unique and of surpassing strength. You cannot afford to miss this.

UNIVERSAL

The great dramatic story, THE GIRL WHO HAD A SOUL, one of Mary Fuller's greatest triumphs. Victor, 3 reel

A love story in which the underworld is brought into intimate touch with the spectator. Nothing like the familiar "police" slapstick melodrama, but a clean, strong play with a grip and punch to it which is continuous throughout. Back of it all is one of the most interesting love stories ever pictured. Mary Fuller, at her best, will most aptly describe the manner in which this brilliant young movie favorite carries her audience with her from first to last.

Certain to make a big success.

UNIVERSAL

IT IS WORRY, NOT WORK, THAT KILLS A MAN

How many hours a week do you spend in endless worry, breaking your head and wearing out your nerves in doping out your program for the coming week?

How many needless chances do you take in selecting films?

How much useless energy do you expend in your efforts to balance up your program, so that it won't be lop-sided and how often do you fall down after your trouble?

You can for ever eliminate all this unnecessary worry, by wiring the nearest Universal exchange and booking the entire complete Universal weekly program, containing twenty-eight powerful productions with seven great, big, magnificent, multiple reel features, and remember you secure all these magnificent multiple reel features every week without extra charge.

Only the Universal with its mighty organization, its galaxy of stars, with its huge capacity and wonderful ability to produce the supreme in moving pictures insures, assures and guarantees constant, continual, unending success week after week for exhibitors who book and show the complete Universal program. Thousands of successful theatres in this and other

EVERY DAY IS UNIVERSAL FEATURE DAY

SUCCESS IS YOURS
If you hitch your wagon to the Great Universal Star Program

Gene Gauntier and Jack Clark in THE SMUGGLER'S LASS, a thrilling romance of the sea. Bison, 2 reel

Movie fans have caught on to Gene Gauntier and Jack Clark in a way which guarantees the success of any picture in which they are featured. In "The Smugglers" they have a plot in which they are thoroughly at home, and this strong and breezy drama of the "blue water" is simply bound to prove a winner wherever shown. UNIVERSAL

WHERE BRAINS ARE NEEDED, Big U, 2 reel drama, a delightful story, featuring Agnes Vernon and Murdock MacQuarrie

"Crime" stories are, as a rule, either too strong for the ordinary spectator or so weak as to be simply a laughing stock. It has remained for the Universal to strike the happy medium and to give pictures like this one with a strong plot, powerfully acted by such stars as Murdock MacQuarrie and Agnes Vernon, an uncommon story of real merit and a setting which carries the air of reality and conviction straight through. Will take a lot of beating. UNIVERSAL

PROFIT AND LOSS, 2-reel Laemmle drama, with Sidney Ayres and Doris Pawn in a strong, powerful love story.

Lemon hunters had better beware of this brilliant and convincing dramatic masterpiece because it is bound to be one of the biggest successes of the year.. The story of the wife, faithless to her blind husband, of her sister's love and patience and the dramatic awakening when the truth is finally revealed are calculated to rouse the emotions of even the most apathetic. A triumphant confirmation of Universal's claim to go one better every time. UNIVERSAL

AN IDYLL OF THE HILLS, a real life drama that grips. Features Pauline Bush and William Dowlin. 2 reel Rex

Lovers of the big outdoors will smell the scent of the trees and hills in every inch of this big, strong, convincing picture. While the West has given us many stories, the deep romance of life in the Hill country has never before been pictured in so stirring and realistic a manner. This picture will be a big hit wherever shown. Pauline Bush and William Dowlin are strong favorites with the Movie public and here they have scored a notable success in an exceptionally realistic play. UNIVERSAL countries are now using the complete Universal program, they have booked it, exhibited it and stuck to it week after week, because they found it immeasurably superior and because it does away with work and worry in exhibitors' efforts to get up his own program.

How much do you spend a week for so-called features?

How much money have you poured into the coffers of the so-called "feature" film makers, whose best efforts do not even begin to measure up to the ordinary standards of the Universal.

By booking the Universal program you secure productions every week that make the average film producers' stuff look sick.

If you are keen for a success, continual, constant, unending, week after week, there is but one answer—BOOK THE UNIVERSAL PROGRAM AND DO IT NOW.

1493-1505 BROADWAY

OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT

NEW YORK April 22, '15.

Marcus Loew

North American Film Corporation
71 West 23rd Street,
New York City

Gentlemen:

I beg to state that I attended your private exhibition of the picturized romantic novel "The Diamond From the Sky" and was so much impressed with it, that I have requested our Mr. Bernstein to close for it on our entire circuit--feeling satisfied that it will be a big drawing card for our theatres.

Yours very truly,

SL-ML

Marcus Loew

Leading Exhibitors Throughout America Have Booked "The Diamond From the Sky"

Marcus Loew's opinion is convincing. But do you know that leading exhibitors throughout the country are of the same opinion? The largest houses—the best houses everywhere—are booking "The Diamond From the Sky." Why? Because it means profits—constant profits. It is the one motion picture production that will bring the crowds back to your theatre regularly.

Take Advantage of the $10,000 Prize Offer!

"THE Diamond From the Sky" is the ONLY motion picture production with a $10,000 offer for a sequel. Remember that! There is no other production now being shown that offers such a powerful incentive to movie patrons. When you run "The Diamond From the Sky" you are privileged to advertise the $10,000 offer as your own. Do you know of any stronger box office attraction?

Read Marcus Loew's statement on the opposite page. Read that line again: "feeling satisfied it will be a big drawing card for our theatres." Marcus Loew has seen the first three chapters of "The Diamond From the Sky." He knows! He has seen the all-star cast—Lottie Pickford, Irving Cummings, William Russell, Charlotte Burton, George Periolat, Eugenie Forde, W. J. Tedmarsh and Orral Humphrey. He knows that $10,000 was paid for the scenario of "The Diamond From the Sky"—and that another $10,000 is now offered for a sequel to this prize play. He knows that this is an exceptional attraction.

First Release May 3rd
Book NOW!

It's up to you. You have every assurance that "The Diamond From the Sky" will be the greatest box office success ever brought out. Are you going to pass this continued photoplay over hurriedly and forget it—or are you going to book it and get your share of the profits? Think—and ACT!! Wire, write or phone the North American Representative at any Mutual Exchange in America—RIGHT NOW!

To revenge himself on the woman who repulsed him, the hunchback acrobat lures her daughter Elaine to the stage.

The girl becomes a famous dancer, and falls in love with a college professor.

In a little town on the road, the murderous hunchback meets the woman whose daughter he stole and kills her.

A blundering detective attempts to fasten the crime on Elaine. She and the professor escape on a moving train. The hunchback follows. There is a thrilling fight on the edge of a cliff and the hunchback goes over.

There is just enough comedy to furnish wholesome relief.

The time is come for a complete reversal of the tone and make-up of Serial Motion Pictures.

The uncanny and mysterious have had their vogue.

The wild and melodramatic types have tired the multitude.

The time is come for something new in Serials.

Realizing the demand, capitalizing the new sentiment, we come with "The Goddess," a new serial that marks a new epoch in picture making.

It has a sunny flavour, a Springtime idyl, a delicious medley of youth, innocence, joy, love, purity and good.

Gouverneur Morris, America's most fluid, liquid writer, has written a story that will dazzle you with its sunny deliciousness.

Charles W. Goddard, author of "The Ghost Breaker" and many other dramatic successes, has picturized the story.

Ralph W. Ince, who has more artistic successes to his name than any other director, has produced the picture.

Anita Stewart, prettiest, cleverest and most charming, is Celestia and playing opposite as Tommy Steele, her chiefest worshipper, is Earle Williams.

Edward A. MacManus, the inventor of the pictorial serial, will have charge of the publication of the story, which will appear in all of the Hearst Syndicated Papers, covering 5,000 cities in the United States.

What more can we say than that Albert E. Smith and J. Stuart Blackton have called together the best talent in the country and have utilized all the wonderful resources of the Vitagraph organization for the production of the most fantastic, artistic serial ever attempted:

Facts and Comments

THE different new companies marketing feature programs have it in their power to contribute substantially to the moral uplift of the motion picture. They are called upon to examine negatives which are offered for sale. The number of negatives seeking a sale is, by the way, constantly increasing. These negatives, or at least a very large number of them, are made by producers who are not affiliated with any of the big organized groups. We have often been told that the "free lance" producer is responsible for the activities of the censor. This is true to an extent. Now, if the purchasers of negatives in the open market will let it be known that they will buy no feature which does not conform to the standards of ordinary decency the "free lance" producers would soon see a new light. If all the reputable producers and importers would get together and discuss and then unanimously adopt certain moral and æsthetic standards for the picture it would be the greatest help imaginable in the fight against legal censorship.

THE United Managers Association are sending out circulars to all film producers, importers and distributors belittling the work done by the exhibitors in the fight against censorship. The authors of the circular profess to be shocked almost beyond expression by the poor management of the exhibitors and then modestly but firmly intimate that if they had been put in charge, the censor laws would have been repealed long ago in one-two-three order. If the United Managers can render no better service to the common cause than dubious waggings of the head and pointing to themselves with ill-concealed pride, we are sorry for them. The exhibitors are satisfied that they have made a good fight; they know they have done their best. It is possible that the aid of the United Managers might have led to an immediate and sweeping victory, but it is exceedingly improbable. The exhibitors are, of course, grateful for any help in the fight against the common enemy, but they do not feel that the achievements of the United Managers entitle them to take the helm—not just yet.

IN a town of a Pacific coast state there arose recently a loud cry for censorship of motion pictures. "The Ministerial Union" took the stand that the moral foundations of the universe were in immediate danger unless a censor was appointed forthwith. Then somebody said that the censor, whoever he or she was, ought to serve without pay. At once the waves of enthusiasm receded. Nobody wanted the job. The pictures remain uncensored and the world spins along as if nothing had happened.

THE attempt to have the law against the interstate transportation of prize fight films declared uncontitutional must interest all friends of the motion picture even though they would be glad to see such films barred forever. A very important principle is involved. Has Congress the power to legislate upon the subject? Does the interstate commerce clause in the Federal Constitution imply the right of the Federal Government to bar any kind of films from the channels of interstate commerce? The Smith-Hughes bill is frankly based upon the theory that Congress has such a power. If the courts decide against the constitutionality of the law barring prize fight films from the channels of interstate commerce the Smith-Hughes bill may be considered dead. On the other hand, if the decision of the court sustains the constitutionality of the law it does not necessarily mean that the Smith-Hughes bill, if enacted into a law, would be invulnerable in the courts. The Smith-Hughes bill goes much further than the law prohibiting the transportation of prize fight films from one state into another. It seeks to establish a censorship of all films offered for interstate commerce. The Treasury Department has authority under the existing laws to establish a censorship for foreign films imported from abroad. The fact that the department has never taken any action under this law is in itself significant. It justifies an inference that the department has looked into the law carefully and has found it inexpedient to act under it.

The Treasury Department has, according to well-founded reports, examined the possible legal troubles that might result from an attempt to enforce such a law and in an informal way the whole matter has been before the Attorney General of the United States. The provision remains a dead letter to this day.

Organize Now.

By W. Stephen Bush.

EXHIBITORS interested in organization have for some time past been watching the conditions in this state. The split in the State of New York and the existence of two factions often furnished a welcome theme for pessimists who do not believe in the possibility of getting and keeping the exhibitors together. Happily the factional differences have now all been wiped out as shown by the full and exclusive report of the proceedings in Buffalo, published in the last issue of The Moving Picture World. The representatives of the League vied in the display of a generous spirit of conciliation with the members of the Association. "Forgive and forget" was the general motto and inspiration. The situation afforded a most agreeable and refreshing contrast to the last state meeting when the fires of faction were burning fiercely. The composition of the new staff of officers shows plainly enough that the old split is thoroughly healed.

Now that New York exhibitors present a solid and united front we hope to see some real results of organization. Organization here and everywhere means work for all, who claim membership. The question has often been put by indifferent and doubting exhibitors: "What good is the organization to us?" The question might be reversed and it would be just as fair to ask these exhibitors: "What use have you been to the organization?" If an exhibitor wants the organization to help him he must be ready to help the organization. The organization does not set up to run opposition to Santa Claus or Andrew Carnegie. The prompt payment of the per capita tax is only the least duty of the exhibitor who believes in organization and who wants to give a practical expression to his belief. He must be willing when occasion demands to sacrifice a little of his time and contribute something of his brains and his experience.

The men who stand for organization today and who are keeping this most important of all movements alive are freely giving of their time and their money. No one sets a better example than the National President, Marion S. Pearce. Mr. Pearce is a man of affairs with a very substantial stake in the exhibiting profession. It is plain that his time is as valuable as that of any high-priced executive man. He took the office of president because he knows as a practical exhibitor and former exchangeman of many years standing that the motion picture interests are suffering through lack of organization. In his own city and state he has caused the exhibiting profession to be respected by the public and to be feared by the politicians. If the exhibitors of Baltimore and Maryland are today enjoying an extraordinary degree of freedom from legal interference Mr. Pearce is largely responsible.

The leadership of such a man has inspired confidence in the exhibitors. Wherever he has gone the cause of organization has grown in favor. In Harrisburg and at Buffalo and even in Ohio his presence has been a source of inspiration. The evident sincerity of the man makes an irresistible appeal to exhibitors and indeed to all who come in contact with him. He makes converts wherever he is heard.

His plans and policies and methods have won the confidence not only of exhibitors, but of the men engaged in the producing and distributing branches as well. This is not the least source of his power. We believe in an organization for exhibitors and for exhibitors only but we see no reason why such an organization cannot be on friendly terms with the producers and distributors. There are scores of problems that interest both the producer and the exhibitor and that are capable of being solved in an equitable manner satisfactory to all.

The Moving Picture World believes that a strong cohesive organization of exhibitors is a good thing for the industry at large. We have been heard to say this before but we will never get tired of emphasizing the fact and keeping it before the attention of our readers. We feel justified in dwelling on it at this particular time because never before has the organization enjoyed such constructive and honorable leadership. There is no longer any excuse for remaining outside the organization.

Begin at once by getting your fellow exhibitors in your own locality to meet and organize. Do not let foolish and petty jealousies stand in the way. Argue with your competitor and try to agree with him instead of seeking to ruin him. Excessive competition, a mad desire to get your competitor out of the way lead to your own ruin. No one knows better than the writer how difficult is the task of conciliating and then organizing discordant elements, but it can be done if good judgment tact and forbearance are used. It will not be long before you will reap the benefits of co-operation and solidarity. I was again impressed with this fact when I noticed the results that had been accomplished by the local organization in Buffalo. The organization being purely local, of course confined itself to local matters, but it succeeded in killing two measures which the Board of Aldermen had tried to force on the exhibitors. The exhibitors there obtained a very substantial concession in the matter of licenses and defeated an ordinance which would have required unreasonable qualifications of the operators. It makes no difference whether there are three or three hundred exhibitors in a city, their interests are identical and what harms one is bound to injure all. This sounds elementary enough, but I make no apology for it as many exhibitors apparently stand in need of an A B C and a kindergarten course in the matter of organization.

We know of isolated localities which have a fairly efficient organization but which do not affiliate with other organized bodies even within the same state. They simply limit their usefulness when they might enlarge it. Strong representative state organizations are the first necessity. Out of a series of such organizations a powerful national body may be welded together.

Within the last few days the writer had occasion to speak to the journalistic representative of a great industry, but not one-half as great and important as ours. This man was deeply impressed with the prosperity of the motion picture industry and with its wonderful possibilities, but he marveled at the lack of proper organization which to him seemed incomprehensible. Considering the vast amount of money which is today invested in motion picture theaters all over the United States with every prospect of a further increase the lack of organization among the owners and managers of these theaters is a very strange phenomenon indeed.

We wish we could keep a megaphone going in every city and proclaiming the muezzin from the top of the minaret, "Exhibitors, you must organize."

Titles and Subtitles.*

By Louis Reeves Harrison.

UNDER the general term "subtitles" are included all explanatory words shown on the screen. The word "title," itself defined as "an inscription placed over something to distinguish or specialize it," is largely inclusive, but it is here narrowed to the name of the story. What that first caption shall be has ever been the hardest problem writers have had to solve. So much depends upon it that literary failures have been suddenly transformed to those of success by a change for the better in the name of a book. The critic, quite as well as the public, is affected by what first reaches the eye, the initial clue to the quality of what is to follow.

No guide can be offered to the selection of a title which will lead to superior results. The author of brilliant imagination is surest to conceive of what is apt to make a hit, yet he fails notably where the amateur strikes the mark with a chance shot. Perhaps the best suggestions to be offered are those indicating what to avoid, and first of these, quite possibly the commonest, is the error of selecting a title which indicates the plot. "They Loved in Vain," "After Many Years," "Won at Last," and the like. Such preliminary announcements spare us any anxiety about the termination even when they do not entirely repress curiosity during development.

To find a name which excites interest without plot disclosure, which is entirely appropriate to some important phase of the narrative without revealing consequences, and has, at the same time, a pulse beat rhythm all its own, is a quest of Diogenes. One needs the lantern of a bright mind to find it. "Paid in Full" strikes a blow of its own and excites interest clear up to the crisis. "Born or Made" opens up a splendid problem. To sound the keynote, or even to suggest the dominant theme without being too general, meanwhile not spoiling what is to be anticipated by advance realization, seems to be the ideal so many are searching for and so few find.

The writer of cramped vocabulary, as well as the one of limited imagination, heads his script with "The" something or other, and even doubles—"The Bandits of the Prairie," when "Soldiers of Fortune" would do just as well and sound better. Professionals err occasionally in this respect, but the amateur announces his incompetence at once with his awkward beginning. Carelessness at the outset does not promise infinite pains with the general plan and failure is cordially invited by the easily-satisfied subtitle.

In an art of no traditions, and one of few illuminating examples, confusion as to the use of subtitles is to be expected. Every man, whether or not he can write a play, can write about it, and he becomes a law unto himself when called upon to direct the visualization of a scenario. A self-appointed editor once sliced about half the subtitles in a carefully composed script for a five-reel feature and explained that a customer "up state" said there were too many subtitles in the pictures. Their appropriateness was a minor consideration. The man from "up state" probably meant that screen announcements of the obvious were unnecessary, and we all agree with him. This does not mean that vigor and vitality of explanatory phrase shall be punished in retaliation, shot down as a terrifying example.

Suppose the action of the day is finished, the lovers have been introduced. Something happens next day and next day. There are periods to be covered without wearisome repetition. A hint is enough.

"Time now yields to Youth and Love
And counts its days in briefest hours."

In fact, the poetic title, when appropriate, is more effective than prose. Some of the freshness, inventiveness and fantastic charm that we enjoy in the printed story is not wholly out of place in subtitling the visualized one.

One strong photodrama, suggested by a poem, worked the action up to points where the verse struck the telling blows. In another, at the Strand Theater, a most spontaneous laugh came from the thousands gathered there because of a cleverly placed subtitle, where the action itself excited no particular amount of amusement. The art was Shakespearian in suiting the action to the word. There is another art, and one quite as important—that of bringing out the peculiar qualities of a screen personage through exhibiting morsels of conversation. There are times when it is irritating to an audience that this is not done. To see people mouthing at each other and be compelled to guess at their utterances is not an undiluted joy for those in front.

In the first act of a five-reel feature, while there is in view a later purpose to represent life, there are opening situations and relations capable of being explained in a few words which would require dozens of visualized scenes to make clear. It is not always possible to determine at a glance whether the attractive lady clinging to the gentleman's arm is his sister, or his cousin, or his wife, or some other fellow's wife. It might be easy to interpret his question, "Do you love me?" but who can picturize hers, "How much are you worth?" We must shamelessly print it or relegate her motives to obscurity. Yet we need not fall into the verbal redundance of the transformed stage play. Nothing is to be gained by concealing a painful truth concerning them; most of them contain so little worth visualizing that the screen versions are more or less reflective of their most cherished utterances.

Whether an author is attempting to give new life and form to old novels and dramas, or whether he is writing straight from his own heart and mind, his own thoughts, his own individuality will be manifest in his subtitles. Good style and good selective taste in this portion of the photodrama, far more than that part treated by the director, reveal the texture of the author's thought. His style is apt to be the result of his ideas more than of his vocabulary, and he has an advantage over the writer of fiction in his freedom to borrow, to take from other sources what exactly suits his ideas and presents them lucidly.

The most beautiful titular form, where there is something to be said that is really worth while, is that of poetry. The great poets of all ages have built treasure houses for the jewels of thought. They have gathered the crude ideas of their generation and shaped them into song. From these accumulations may be drawn nearly all the requisites of the subtitle, particularly of that superior kind in which all is said that should be said and nothing else besides. Their finest compositions often contain exactly what is suited to subtitling the pictured story, opening no sentence without a meaning to it. Their logical application and their entire appropriateness assured, they furnish what the author seeks and the audience most likes—"much in little." The oldest of literary counsels affords a fairly safe guide—"sow with the hand, not with the sack."

Applaud Freedom of Screen.

The Project of The Moving Picture World to Write the Freedom of the Screen into the Fundamental Law of the State Strongly Advocated by Film Interests—F. J. Marion of Kalem, Samuel Goldfish of Lasky, Daniel Frohman of Famous Players, and Samuel L. Rothapfel Give Their Reasons for Endorsing the Appeal to the Constitutional Convention.

THE proposition of The Moving Picture World to embody in the fundamental law of the State a provision putting the motion picture on the same footing as the press, continues to find favor with the big men of the industry. Samuel Goldfish, the financial manager of the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company, received a representative of the Moving Picture World in the handsome new offices of the corporation on West Forty-first street.

Goldfish O. K.'s World Plan.

"This is indeed a splendid idea of The Moving Picture World," said Mr. Goldfish, who is known to hold very positive opinions on the question of censorship. "If this censorship mania should spread it would soon reach the legitimate drama and vaudeville and the public would have to do without any amusements in this world. I believe it is the mission and purpose of the stage, as well as the screen, to give pictures of real life; the only kind of pictures which the public enjoy. The Lasky Company has from its very inception worked for the uplift of the picture. To give a true and faithful picture of life we cannot altogether eliminate the shadows. There have been many pictures, for instance, showing the evils of intemperance or the folly of young people smoking cigarettes. If we cannot portray the evil how can we lead up to the remedy and the reformation? Do we not know for a matter of fact that the motion pictures have kept more people away from saloons than any other agency? The motion picture entertainment is an invitation to the whole family. Our pictures aim at that. A wild-eyed censorship would discourage us to stay in business. I can tell you from my experience that no one whose aim is not high and conscientious can stay in this business very long. The purely sensational appeal which sacrifices every thing for the sake of sensation may have a short vogue but no exhibitor is justified in trying to build upon such foundations.

"Let me say again that I heartily endorse the plan of The Moving Picture World. Either I or Mr. Lasky or our attorneys will be present at the Constitutional Convention whenever our presence may be required. I wish you success in your plan. We want to work with you. These things require work; nothing is ever accomplished by setting back and letting the other fellow do it."

Frank J. Marion of the Kalem Company who had recently addressed a gathering of newspaper editors and publishers up-State on the dangers of censorship to the press, gladly gave half an hour of his time to approve of The World's idea and to express his own very definite and aggressive attitude on the subject.

Censorship of Pictures a Warning to the Press.

"There surely is no more reason for censoring motion pictures than there is for censoring the press," declared Mr. Marion with the emphasis which goes with a strong conviction. "The newspaper men of the country ought to realize that if motion picture censorship is declared legal and constitutional the next step will be an attempt to censor the press. Censorship is merely the projection of one set of minds upon another set of minds without the latter's consent. Now, whenever you find government adopting an arbitrary control of morals you will find a revolution. The French Revolution was caused in this way. Religion, after centuries of struggle, has freed itself from censorship.

"I listened the other day to a man who spoke before a large crowd in Madison Square. His speech was one long tirade against Christianity. Now, is it not most extraordinary that we feel perfectly safe about allowing this absolute freedom of speech, even in regard to religion which is the most vital subject of all and that, at the same time, we cannot trust ourselves in our most innocent form of amusements?

"The press does not seem to realize that we are entering upon a most extraordinary phase. It cannot understand the menace of censorship to itself. We let every hysteria in religion and even in philosophy and medicine run its course subject only to existing laws which deal with overt acts only such, for instance, as open and acknowledged malpractice. The motion picture alone is assaulted with a scheme of censorship for which there is no reason whatever. I say no reason whatever, except perhaps, that the motion picture is regarded as easy prey. In the eyes of the politicians probably we are 'easy.' Now this being 'easy' is up to the moving picture men. Just as long as we appear to be 'easy' we will be singled out as victims by the politicians.

"The most extraordinary phase of the situation is this: While I was complimented upon my speech by the editors whom I addressed and while, at the end of my remarks, they all assured me that they agreed with me, I found later when I had occasion to read their papers that they had not followed their convictions as expressed to me, but had taken a position in regard to motion pictures diametrically opposed to the one they had said they would take. They had yielded to the clamor of self-constituted censors as shown by their editorials. I am indeed at a loss to understand the attitude of the American press, especially in view of the fact that within recent years they have enjoyed a handsome revenue from the motion picture business. The papers of to-day publish exactly the same kind of material that motion pictures illustrate, i. e., stories to get prominent space in the average paper of to-day must be full of ginger and of human interest, they must show virtue by contrasting it with villainy and, in short, run the gamut of human life in all its phases. Our laws have never, since the very beginning, made any distinction or discrimination between pictures and the typed page; they are subject to the same laws of copyright. The language of our laws on the subject leave no room for doubt. The still picture is not censored; there is no pretence that the state has a right to censor it; why should it be censored when it is a picture in motion? Every intelligent man will say at once: "There is no reason why it should.'

"Personally the only advantage I have ever seen in censorship has been its advertising value; upon the pure merits censorship is entirely unnecessary and I have always held this opinion. To come back to my original conclusion. We must impress upon the newspapers of the country that if they are willing to stand for censorship of motion pictures they must eventually be prepared to submit to the censorship of the press."

Daniel Frohman, the active veteran of the American stage, who looks back upon a life-long record of purveying none but clean, wholesome and elevating plays to the American public, was found at his familiar old home, the Lyceum Theater. The Japanese guardian of the gate being temporarily absent, Mr. Frohman acted as his own elevator man in bringing The World representative into his historic den where so much theatrical history has been made within the last generation.

"Simplest Way Out," Says Frohman.

"I regard this plan of The Moving Picture World as the simplest way out of a complicated situation," said Mr. Frohman after he had extended a hearty welcome to his visitor. "Of course you understand that I have been really beyond the pale of censorship, for the nature of the productions I have been identified with all my life has been such as to preclude any censorial interference. Our slogan at the Lyceum always has been clean and wholesome plays. The same policy I followed of course when I became associated with the Famous Players. We believe in popular plays and popular actors and we realize that the foundation of all desirable popularity in this country is moral soundness. I have aimed to present plays which might be properly discussed at the family breakfast table. I may say that we have declined many plays and players because their fame had too strong a flavor of the sensational.

"Now in regard to this censorship problem: If we do succeed in the plan you have outlined would it not be best to call together all the producers and some of the important exhibitors, too, and devise certain standards? Let me put it this way: The film art ought to have its 'index expurgatorius.' On this index ought to go all things that ought never to appear on either stage or screen, such things for instance as race hatred, prizefights, murder, incest, etc., etc. If, as you say, the producer ought to share in the liberty as well as in the responsibility of the publisher, then this general cry of anathema against the pictures would soon come to an end.

"As to the rest, I find that public opinion in this country is a pretty good safeguard. This is a democratic country, the foundation of the state is the family and virtue is the corner stone of the social fabric. Plays that in the countries of Europe pass unchallenged, do not always go here. Whether it is the climate, our environment, or our social life I do not know, but we are less sophisticated here and the problem play, especially the problem plays of the sexual variety, which the people in Europe see without being necessarily corrupted thereby, does not appeal to our audiences, though

I will say that of late our public have allowed the stage a much wider latitude. In the old play, "Sweet Lavender," surely a clean and wholesome play, we had to legitimatize the daughter of the old couple, even though there was not the slightest offense in the way the play was designed originally. A profound change in the public feeling occurred as recently as the showing of "The Second Mrs. Tanqueray," which we intended to show only at matinees and for a limited number of performances.

"I cannot leave the subject of censorship without saying a word in regard to the poster evil. That is giving us a great deal of trouble. What the censors lose sight of is the fact that every play is but an epitomization of life. If evil is shown, it is done only to make the final triumph of good all the more apparent. I might sum up by saying that the history of successful plays is the history of clean plays."

The writer here complimented Mr. Frohman upon the clean character of all the Famous Players features. Mr. Frohman smiled pleasantly as he added this P. S. to his interview:

"I appreciate your tribute, but there are other companies, in fact all of the big companies, that are just as much entitled to this praise as we are. I think such concerns as the Lasky Company, the Vitagraph, the Edison and a dozen others I might name have striven consistently for clean and wholesome plays for the screen."

Samuel L. Rothapfel, the managing director of The Strand, heartily endorsed the project of The Moving Picture World to write the freedom of the screen into the organic law of the state of New York. There are probably few reviewers or exhibitors who look at more pictures than Mr. Rothapfel. The pressure on his time is heavy and continous. None have better opportunities to see the weak and the strong points of dramatic, educational, topical and comic pictures. Mr. Rothapfel began by calling attention to the fact that no picture is ever shown on the screen of The Strand without being first seen by himself.

Managerial Selection Sufficient.

"You have never seen the display of anybody's approval on any of the pictures that you saw in this theater," declared Mr. Rothapfel, whose sincerity and directness of speech have become proverbial in film circles. "I am my own censor. An exhibitor if he is serious in his work and gives full attention to his duties must be competent to say at a moment's notice what would be objectionable from a moral point of view or what would be in such bad taste as to cause hostile criticism. The Strand is now more than a year old and our show has been seen by hundreds of thousands of men, women and children, but there has never been any objection made against the pictures from a moral point of view. Nor have any really bad violations of good taste ever occurred in The Strand. There is no reason in the world why the standards maintained here cannot be followed all over the country. I am working with materials that are accessible to all everywhere. This really would be the most effective crusade against censorship. It would be nothing less than a tragedy from an ethical as well as an artistic point of view if the great producers of the country would have to work under the eyes of the censor cranks; men and women who, without exception, are ignorant of the very origin and conception of art and who in the matter of perception and discrimination and sound commonsense have been the obvious victims of nature's studied neglect. Art abhors censorship, true art is incompatible with narrow-minded fanaticism and art has rendered as much service to mankind as religion and perhaps more. The highest development and the highest destiny of the motion picture will be indefinitely retarded by censorship. Censorship cannot do any good; it can only do harm."

PHILADELPHIA CRITICS DINE LUBIN.

The dramatic and musical critics of Philadelphia gave a dinner at the Hotel Majestic in Philadelphia last week in honor of Siegmund Lubin, head of the Lubin Manufacturing Company. The critics have an association and recently Mr. Lubin entertained them at his studio and gave them an opportunity of seeing the inner workings of the big Lubin plant.

George Rogers of the Philadelphia Inquirer, president of the association, paid a splendid tribute to Mr. Lubin for the work the latter has accomplished in the moving picture industry and then "Pop" was persuaded to make a speech. It wasn't a regulation after dinner speech, but a sort of informal heart to heart talk on moving pictures. Mr. Lubin told them of his early struggles, of his failures and successes, of what he was doing today, and what he hoped to accomplish in the future.

L. C. Shumway.

APPEARING in one play as a dashing juvenile lead, in another as the vindictive and despicable villain, and playing character parts depicting men of all ages and conditions, has been the work of L. C. Shumway, one of the most versatile members of the Western Lubin Company, at Los Angeles, for the past eighteen months.

L. C. Shumway.

Shumway is making rapid advancement as a screen performer and is very popular. He did his first work before the public while a member of the dramatic club of the University of Salt Lake City. The desire to follow in the steps of his grandfather, a noted actor who had played with Annie Adams Kiskadden, mother of Maude Adams, and scores of other noted actors and actresses, caused him to make a special study of all matters pertaining to the stage while in the university.

Eighteen months ago Shumway joined the Lubin players at the Los Angeles studio, and it was not very long before he was one of the most popular men there. Among the recent releases of the Lubin pictures in which he created the leading roles may be mentioned "The Candidate for Mayor," "Lure of Car Wheels" and "Sealed Orders." The high regard in which Shumway is held by the public is best shown by the many appreciative letters he receives constantly from all parts of this country and abroad.

Ann Murdock with Metro.

ANN MURDOCK, at present playing one of the most important parts in the Belasco-Frohman revival of "A Celebrated Case" at the Empire Theater, and well remembered as the charming star of Henry W. Savage's great comedy, "Excuse Me," which ran for two years at the Gaiety Theater, New York, has been secured by the Metro Pictures Corporation for appearance in her former great success, "The Royal Family," which will be turned over to one of the producing companies allied with Metro. The agreement between Metro and Miss Murdock calls for her exclusive appearance in Metro pictures for a period of months, work to begin shortly.

Ann Murdock.

Ann Murdock in "Excuse Me" created a most favorable impression. Her humorous interpretation of the young bride in that piece attracted more than favorable notices and when she was seen recently as the young fiancee in Edward Peple's "A Pair of Sixes," and more recently in "The Celebrated Case" revival, the fact stood out that here was a new and bright star. Consequently, Metro, with the customary foresight, placed her under contract.

"The Royal Family" is a former Frohman success and will admirably suit Miss Murdock as a screen vehicle.

Work will begin on the Murdock pictures within a few weeks and the feature will be released early in July.

At Santa Barbara

Blaisdell Sees Jay Cairns and Other Interesting Sights in California's Newest Picture Centre.

By the Moving Picture World's Staff Correspondent.

Los Angeles, California.

SANTA BARBARA, the home of the American Film Manufacturing Company and seven companies producing for the Kriterion program, is a town of marked natural beauty. One side is on the ocean. On all the others mountains running to three or four thousand feet in height hem it in. The streets are laid out on modern lines. It is one of the boasts of the place that there are no manufacturing establishments. Motion pictures are excluded from this category, inasmuch as the positive prints are made elsewhere. The trip was taken in the car of Meyer Cohen, of the Kriterion Los Angeles office. There was a late start, but Mr. Cohen said he would try to make Santa Barbara before dark. He did, but there was some tall driving done in the hundred and fifteen or twenty miles indicated on the clock. At times the roads were excellent; at intervals they were bad, and then some. There were a number of incidents in the five-hour run over the uncompleted state highway calculated to test what sometimes we try to make ourselves believe is nerve, but which of course really is the lack of it. There was, for instance, the fast negotiation of narrow winding ascending and descending mountain roads, accompanied during the earlier stages of the journey by mental calculation as to how far one would drop or how many times the automobile would turn over if thirty or forty feet behind the bend there should be a car coming in the opposite direction. Much might be written of that trip, of the wonderfully fertile valleys dotted with great groves of orange, lemon and olive trees, or again at times of the utter absence of human habitations or beings. As the sun declined a winter overcoat was none too heavy for comfort as we sped along the ocean and for a considerable distance on a bridge over it.

O. J. Cairns and Blaisdell with Party at Santa Barbara Studio.

Jay Cairns of old New Rochelle was one of the first we met in Santa Barbara. He was chatting with S. S. Hutchinson, president of the American company, who on the morrow was to start for Chicago. Harold Lockwood, one of the American's leading men, dropped in at the hotel. There were a couple of minutes of comedy when we got John Steppling on the telephone. He was finally convinced of the identity of the disturber of his evening pipe; in five minutes he was at the hotel resplendent in white ducks and Panama. Then there were Irving Commings and Lottie Pickford, the leads of the new $20,000 prize continued photoplay. "The Diamond from the Sky," which the American is producing and which will make its initial bow to the picture going public on May 3. Jacques Jaccard, who is directing the new subject, was another visitor.

In the morning Mr. Cairns took us for an eighteen-mile drive to Hope Ranch, around among the mountains overlooking the town, and then out to where Director Jaccard was staging a duel scene scene between Irving Cummings and William Russell, the heavy lead of "The Diamond from the Sky." There was a near accident which compelled a retake. The two men faced each other with their left hands grasping a corner of the same handkerchief. The players had placed a good-sized piece of tin under their shirt-fronts to protect from powder burns when the pistols held almost against their bodies were discharged. Mr. Russell's aim was disturbed by his unexpected stumbling; Mr. Cummings got the powder in his right arm. It just happened we had the camera bearing on the spot. The mounds of earth are the excavations from a stage grave.

A visit to the beautiful studio of the American company followed. Then came a charming luncheon at which Mrs. John Steppling was the hostess. These California player-folk with their bungalows and grounds have much "on" their apartment-dwelling New York brothers and sisters. Present at the luncheon also was Henry W. Otto, Mr. Stepping's director.

In the afternoon Mr. Cohen escorted us over the Santa Barbara plant of the Kriterion. The Studio is in the rear of a mansion surrounded by trees of pine, palm, eucalyptus, orange, rose, pepper and magnolia. There was a meeting up with "Bob" Daly, Lloyd Carleton, Phil Walsh, scenario editor; Dr. E. J. Boesig, president of the Santa Barbara company, one of the pioneers of the town and three times mayor; S. Fergens, business manager. Ed Alexander, Al Swenson and others.

In the evening Jay Cairns in his limousine took us to the bungalow of Mr. Cummings for dinner. Miss Lottie Pickford was a guest, too. Here again we revert to the New York apartment—it's so different. Sitting in this bungalow, two indirect lamps alone being lighted, looking out across the mountain-walled town below, and at the moon reflected in the Pacific, one could see that absence from Broadway had many compensations. ("Bill" Russell, likewise, talks about his ranch and his horse, his dog, his garden and outdoor life generally. "Fine enough," he said, "even almost to forget the Screen Club.") Coming back to the dinner, if one may judge by the performance of the cook who presides in the kitchen of this bungalow, the Japanese will never have to go to war to exterminate the Americans. There are slower but surer and much more pleasant means. We went back to the hotel in Mr. Cummings' two-seated racer. It was a hair-raising ride, assuming, of course, that there was enough to raise.

In the morning, Jay Cairns administered to the World man the first lesson in the art of riding a horse. It was so thoughtful of him, too. He and the horse have persisted much in our memory the past week. The ride up into the foothills lasted nearly two hours, punctuated by a doubly welcome stop at the beautiful home of a well-known Easterner of whom we will speak at length later on.

Just before his departure, Mr. Hutchinson, who now, owing to his expanding business, is practically a resident of Santa Barbara, said that the American company had not been affected by the war in Europe. His sales in England and Spain have increased; in Holland the company is now doing as much business as formerly was done in Germany. Mr. Hutchinson said that for some time all of the production of the American had been done in Santa Barbara. The establishment in Chicago, the 230 by 100 foot plot of which is entirely covered by buildings, is now devoted to manufacturing. The factory at Croydon, in England, is standardized with the Chicago plant and turns out all prints intended for foreign exhibition.

"The American now has two companies working on features and there are two stock companies," said Mr. Hutchinson. "We have a plan of working that is different from most other picture concerns. We keep each stock company together as a unit, as an entity. We find that the public seems to like that system better—to have the same director and the same players working together. Better results are secured because they are used to each other's style of work. Then, again, each company specializes on a certain style of work. We are now producing an average of eight and a quarter reels a week. There are two singles and a double and four reels of special stuff and one special reel a month.

"Our policy is to make high-class, cheerful comedies and dramas. There are two factors in American pictures we especially aim for—moral tone and photography. Of course, there are many other and vital factors entering into the making of good pictures. We want to employ these—to get right all along the line. I am a believer in giving encouragement to those working with me wherever it is possible."

The American is bending every energy to make "The Diamond from the Sky" a record-breaker. In the cast, besides those already named, are George Periolat, who has returned to the American after an absence; Eugenie Forde, Charlotte Burton, Lillian Buckingham, Orra Humphrey and W. J. Tedmarsh. The picture of the group was posed in one corner of the American studio. BLAISDELL.

Fire Experts Burn Ton of Film.

Unique Tests to Learn Correct Vent Opening for Vaults Are Conducted at New Universal Studio.

BEFORE a representative gathering of fire experts and a number of motion picture men, two tests designed to determine the size of the opening needed in a vault used for the storage of film were made on the afternoon of April 22 on the ground adjoining the new Universal studio being erected at Leonia, N. J. The experiments were arranged by F. G. T. Stewart, chairman of the executive committee of the National Fire Protection Association, co-operating with a committee of film manufacturers in solving the problems met in preparing a revised set of "rules and regulations governing the storage and handling of nitro-cellulose motion picture film." These final tests, based on conclusions drawn from preliminary experiments on March 11, were spectacular in the extreme and of a kind never before attempted. Nearly a ton of film was burned in a vault built for the occasion and 290 pounds of film was ignited in an ordinary cabinet. A detailed report has yet to be prepared, but Mr. Stewart, J. F. Ancona, fire expert of the Eastman Kodak Company, and William Sistrom of the Universal Company, who has looked after the interests of manufacturers throughout the conferences with the fire underwriters, agree in believing that conclusions relative to the proper vent opening for vaults, deduced from experiments made by the U. S. Geological Survey in 1910, are confirmed.

Among those who witnessed the tests at Leonia were Mr. Stewart, Charles A. Hexamer, secretary of the Philadelphia Fire Underwriters' Association; Chiefs Kenyon and Demarest of the New York Fire Department; Mr. Ancona of the Eastman Company; A. C. Hudson and George W. Booth of the National Board of Fire Underwriters; A. E. Ewen of the New York Fire Underwriters; a delegation from Columbia University; R. H. Cochran, P. D. Cochran, Mr. Sistrom, J. M. Nicholaus and Paul Gulick of the Universal Company; C. A. Willat of the Willat studios and J. F. Chalmers of the Moving Picture World.

The vault used in the test was built at the expense of the fire underwriters, according to specifications drawn by Mr. Stewart. It was of 12-inch terra cotta tile with a capacity of 133 cubic feet, and a vent opening of 285 square inches covered by glass. The racks on both sides of the vault were filled with reels in cans and exposed, and the space between the racks was packed with naked film, ignited by a spark plug. The conditions were made much more severe than those ever to be expected in a vault in actual use. Had the vent opening been insufficient, the vault would have been ripped to pieces by an explosion.

The glass covering the opening gave way a few seconds after the fire had been started and the flames shot out in a tremendous blast for something over 70 feet. A Universal camera man, stationed about 40 feet to the south of the vault, was forced to change his position and Mr. Ewen, in attempting to read the instruments registering the pressure, was in danger of being severly burned. His face was blistered and his hair singed. Rocks fifty feet from the mouth of the vault crumbled under the heat, and a fire broke out in the underbrush in a field far removed from the blazing film. The fire lasted approximately three minutes without damaging the vault. All of the experts present declared that the opening had been figured correcly for the purpose of carrying off the gases and preventing an explosion.

The cabinet test was inconclusive in substantiating a claim that a partition in the center would confine a fire to the compartment in which it started. A flue communicating with both sides of the cabinet naturally carried the flames from one to the other, and the experiment went for little, except in proving the quality of the ½-inch asbestos boards that withstood the heat from 290 pounds of burning film. At the end of the three-minute blaze the cabinet was charred, but not otherwise damaged.

After the tests, Messrs. Ancona and Sistrom agreed in maintaining that there was danger of approaching the question of the storage of film from the wrong angle. They held that "the important problem from any point of view is not how to handle gas and smoke given off by burning film, but how to prevent film from burning, and it is on this problem that those interested in the future of the business should direct their attention."

Mr. Sistrom continued: "The result of the U. S. Geological Survey experiments indicated that the pressure relief opening in a vault should be not less than two square centimeters for each kilogram of film, which is approximately equivalent to a circular opening 3 inches in diameter for every 100,000 feet of film. Vaults built since 1910 have ordinarily not been vented in accordance with the above, nor have the regulations of insurance rating boards called for such large openings. It is probable that the net result of the recent experiments will be a modification of the regulations and building practice to conform with the 1910 results. It is not claimed that the recent tests are without importance, but it should be clearly understood that the pressure relief opening has absolutely nothing to do with preventing fire. By materially lessening the protection given by well constructed vaults, a very large opening may in fact increase the chance of a fire starting in a vault unless very great care is exercised in protecting the opening from exterior exposures.

"The insurance rating boards can and undoubtedly will exercise considerable influence on the future development of prevention methods. It is claimed that the present average rate gives a loss ratio altogether unsatisfactory to the insurance costs. If to correct this ratio they simply horizontally increase rates, they will to some extent retard the general adoption of higher standards of construction and operation, and to some extent compel concerns that must for their own protection adopt the very highest grade of fireproof construction, and go the extreme limit in fire prevention methods, to look to some other means of covering themselves against remotely possible losses. On the other hand, if the rating boards make low rates on well constructed, well managed plants and look to high charges for deficiencies to take care of the loss ratio, the operation of low grade plants would quickly become financially impossible.

"Apart from the effect of insurance rates, whatever improvements in conditions are to be made must come from the people actually responsible for the handling or storage of film. They probably realize, and in any case ought to realize, that there is more at stake than their own property; the entire business as at present conducted is involved."

Mr. Aneona stated that there are only three things to guard against: electric or other sparks, open flames, and high temperatures, such as hot water and steam pipes. "To meet these three simple conditions is surely not beyond the ability of the men who have made the film business what it is today; but they must meet these conditions promptly if the industry is not to be seriously injured.

"The first and most important problem is to prevent fires, the next how to hold such fires as may occur within very narrow limits. If these two problems are taken up promptly and seriously, it is highly probable that the provision made for handling a film fire of considerable magnitude will never be tested, because such fires will never occur."

A final meeting of the National Fire Protection Association will be held some time in May. This will be the last time that the motion picture men can present their case before the report of the association is completed. It is believed that there will be an opportunity for picture men to be heard at this meeting.

GEISENBERG COMPLETES CONTINENTAL TOUR.

Leonard Geisenberg, the chief of the Alliance travelling force, arrived in New York Monday from an extended trip. During his tour Mr. Geisenberg confined his activities to the territory west of Chicago.

"The thing that impressed me the most on my tour," said Mr. Geisenberg, "was the rapid growth of high-class large capacity houses patterned after the Strand in New York. It is surprising to see how much capital is being invested in this type of theater.

"The New American in Salt Lake City is one of the finest theaters that I have ever been in. An orchestra of sixty-five alternate with a beautiful toned organ which is played by the organist of the Mormon Tabernacle.

"The Liberty in Seattle is another beautiful photoplay house. They are everywhere, and everywhere the people are deserting the cheap vaudeville houses and flocking to these theaters where the performance is conducted with so much refinement."

SLATER BILL LAUGHED TO DEATH.

The California Senate Judiciary Committee unanimously reported "do not pass" on the Slater bill to prohibit a trainer from entering a wild animal's cage, according to messages received at the Chicago offices of the Selig Polyscope Company. Attorneys representing the Selig Polyscope Company stated that wild animals were trained by kindness and not by fear, and produced a number of pictures of animals and humans in affectionate attitudes to prove the contention. The committee laughed the bill to death.

Death of John Bunny

Famous Comedian of the Vitagraph Company Succumbs to Bright's Disease at His Home in Flatbush.

JOHN BUNNY, famous the world over as the leading comedian of the motion picture screen, died at his home, 1416 Glenwood Avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y., on Monday, April 26, after a brief illness. The cause of death was Bright's disease, aggravated by over-exertion upon the recent tour of the motion picture theaters of the country. The funeral services were held at the clubhouse of the Elks' Lodge No. 1, in West 43d Street, New York, at 8 o'clock Wednesday evening, and interment was made on Thursday at Evergreen cemetery, Brooklyn.

The Late John Bunny.

The deceased was in his fifty-second year and is survived by his widow, a son, John Bunny, Jr., and a brother, George Bunny. His mother is also living.

John Bunny was born in Brooklyn. His father and mother came from Penzance, England. After receiving an education in St. James Parochial school in Jay Street, he found employment in the offices of the New York Central Railroad Company. Nature had endowed him so richly, both physically and mentally, with the ability to make people laugh, that he became interested in theatrical life at an early age, his first work being with a minstrel company. His physical appearance, now so familiar, limited his activities to certain parts. One of his great successes was a "rube" part in "Way Down East." For nearly thirty years he appeared on the legitimate stage with varying success with such well known stars as Sol Smith Russell, Maude Adams and Annie Russell, and in companies managed by Charles Frohman, Daniel Frohman, Henry W. Savage, William A. Brady and the Shuberts. His latest dramatic success was in the character of Nick Bottom in "Midsummer Night's Dream" when that delightful Shakespearean comedy was produced by Annie Russell.

Bunny's first appearance in motion pictures was with the Vitagraph Company in 1910. During the four years that followed he appeared in many screen plays and his presence contributed more than any other one thing to the rapidly increasing popularity of pictures in general and the product of the Vitagraph Company in particular. His achievements are best expressed in an editorial by the New York World of April 27 in these words:

Fame and John Bunny.

"Millions of persons no doubt will mourn the loss of John Bunny to whom the death of a Prince or Prime Minister would be a matter of indifference. A discriminating London critic a year ago called him the "most famous man in the world," and the reels upon reels of films that have since then displayed his expansive features have certainly not dimmed his renown.

"Bunny was a competent actor of comedy roles in the regular drama for years, yet unknown to one in a thousand of those who subsequently came to know and admire him through the movies. The advent of the film drama found him peculiarly well endowed for the new art of acting without words. The range of his facial expression was altogether wonderful, and when the emotion of the moment had told its story in his features there was nothing left for the words to do. The London Saturday Review once said:

"'When Mr. Bunny laughs, people from San Francisco to Stepney Green laugh with him. When Mr. Bunny frowns, every kingdom of the earth is contracted in one brow of woe. When he smells a piece of Gorgonzola cheese, there is no doubt whatever that his nose has been seriously offended. His despair is incredible. His grief is unendurable. His wrath is apoplectic. His terror is the panic of a whole army.'

"The movies gave him a unique fame, and he in turn gave to the movies a talent for entertainment which helped mightily in justifying their reason for existence."

Than that little more may be said.

About two years ago Bunny made a trip to London with a company of Vitagraph players, where he participated in a number of pictures, notably "Mr. Pickwick," an adaptation of Dickens' story. While in England Bunny was feted on every hand and was "copy" for many a London pressman. Soon after his return to the Brooklyn studios of the Vitagraph Company Bunny planned to make a tour around the world with his own company, but the breaking out of the war in Europe made the trip impossible and Bunny was compelled to limit his tour to American cities. It was while on this engagement that he was taken ill and compelled to return to his home. For a time it was thought that the progress of his complaint might be arrested, but a turn for the worst came about a week ago.

Bunny was a prominent member of Elks Lodge No. 1, at the home of which the last rites were pronounced. He was also a Mason, a member of the Vaudeville Club, and a charter member of the Screen Club, an organization of motion picture men in New York.

To the world of motion pictures the death of John Bunny brings a distinct loss. His work as a comedian was always clean in character and furnished amusement of the most wholesome nature. The Moving Picture World joins the ranks of sorrowing millions who have seen Bunny to enjoy him, and feel a keen regret at his untimely taking away.

Universal Features

Famous Plays and Novels, Acted by Stage Favorites, Will Be Released on Regular Program.

MULTIPLE-REEL productions of famous plays and novels, acted by celebrated actors of the legitimate stage, is the latest plan of the Universal Company, and according to advance reports it is to be carried out on a large scale. Already a long list of popular plays has been secured and many players, whose names have been flashed in electric lights along Broadway, have signed contracts. This new move is of particular interest to exhibitors using Universal pictures, owing to the fact that all of the adaptations of popular plays and novels, to be filmed as soon as possible, are to be released unreservedly on the regular program. They will establish a feature supply along with the regular routine service, which marks a novel departure for the film business.

The pictures will be in four reels, and for a time each weekly program will include one. Just as soon as the production machinery is in smooth working order, the number of releases will be increased to two a week. Special arrangements are being made by the scenario department for the placing of the plays and books in scenario form. Julius Stern expects to handle most of the productions in the Eastern studio.

Among the attractions already assured ore Marie Cahill in "Judy Forgot," Nat C. Goodwin in "Business is Business;" Julia Dean in her success of last season, "Her Own Money;" Wilton Lackaye, who is now appearing as Svengali in the revival of "Trilby," in a Broadway play not yet selected; Helen Ware, who is playing with Mr. Goodwin in the revival of "The Celebrated Case" at the Empire, in a novel of Mrs. Frances Hodgson Burnett's called "Lass o' Lowries;" Emmett Corrigan in the F. Hopkinson Smith's novel, "Caleb West, Master Diver;" Charles E. Evans, of the famous team of Evans and Hoey, in his own original creation, "The Parlor Match;" Ward and Vokes, another clever comedy team, in "The Run on the Bank;" Lawrence D' Orsay, the famous English comedian, in his most famous role in "The Earl of Pawtucket." Frank Keenan has been signed; also Henry E. Dixey and Herbert Kelsey and Effie Shannon and suitable plays will be provided for them as soon as possible.

TO FILM "THE BATTLE."

"The Battle," in which Wilton Lackaye scored one of his greatest successes, is the next production to be staged at the George Kleine studio in New York City. George Fitzmaurice, whose production of "The Commuters" is released this week, is in charge of the filming of "The Battle." He has been provided with a strong cast. Frank Sheridan will be seen in the Wilton Lackaye role, with Anne Meredith in Josephine Victor's original part, and Fania Marinoff seen in the character created by Elsie Ferguson. Paul McAllister, Calvin Thomas, Sam Reid and Bert Gudgeon complete the cast.

Universal's Beauty Contest.

Every Effort Being Made to Make This the Biggest Contest of Its Kind Ever Held in This Country.

INTEREST in the Universal Film Company's great National Beauty Contest is increasing daily, and with the forty-six newspapers throughout the country bending all their efforts to find the most beautiful girl in their respective states there is no doubt but that this is one of the most unique publicity campaigns ever promoted. Much space is being devoted to this contest by newspapers. Sturdy old conservative institutions, as the Atlanta Constitution, New Orleans Item and Boston Traveler, are getting so warmed up over it as to devote nearly a page to it each day. From present indications it looks as though the contest will occupy the attention of the public all summer, for, while it closes on May 15, yet the trip to the Pacific Coast, the announcement of the most beautiful girl in America, the return of the party, which will be around the middle of July, and the many incidents in connection with the trip out and back, will be consuming considerable space in the big dailies far into August and September.

It is stated authoritatively that over 1,500 full pages have appeared in connection with this contest in the various newspapers throughout the country since the contest started on April 1. And the majority of the editors of the newspapers running the same have written the Universal to the effect that this is the greatest contest of its kind ever held in their particular states.

Judging from the photographs which are being published daily in the majority of these newspapers, the Universal Special, when it pulls out of Chicago on June 6 for its long trip over the Santa Fe, is going to have aboard the most beautiful girls ever congregated together at one time, and fortunate indeed will be the men permitted to travel with this remarkable group. It is stated at the Universal offices there will be but three men aboard this special! They will be Joe Brandt, manager of the home office, the man who originated the idea; Nat. G. Rothstein, advertising manager of the Universal, and H. H. Van Loan, who has been handling the contest with Mr. Brandt.

No effort or expense has been spared to make the party comfortable, and the Universal has been successful in obtaining the co-operation of some of the largest concerns in the country, who have generously contributed their time and patience to make this trip one which will ever remain stamped indelibly upon the memory of the girls who will be fortunate enough to take this trip. For example, Marjorie Benton Cooke, the author of Doubleday, Page & Company's best seller, "Bambi," is going to contribute an autographed volume of this book to each girl. This company has gone to the expense of preparing a special edition, handsomely bound in leather, with an added frontispage containing a message to the party. Colgate & Company are going to present each girl with a set of toilet articles, especially prepared with a special "Universal American Beauty" label; the International Handkerchief Company are presenting a dozen dainty handkerchiefs to each girl; the Famous Players Souvenir Company are giving a half dozen beautiful "Mary Fuller" silver teaspoons to each girl; the Clysmic Spring Company and the E. T. Welch Grape Juice Company are furnishing the liquids, and the Victor Company, through the courtesy of its general manager, Harry Brown, is going to place a Victrola aboard. The Higgins & Gollmar Company, the largest stationers in New York City, are preparing some very dainty stationery for the girls to use on the train. This is very neatly gotten up and has the miniature Universal trade-mark, embossed in gold, in the upper left hand corner, with the words "On Board the Universal Special."

In addition to this, The Ladies' World is giving a three months' subscription to each girl, while the Leslie-Judge Company and the Life Publishing Company are contributing reading material in addition to copies of Life, Judge and Leslie's Weekly for the party to read while on the train. To appease the appetites of the girls, the Loose-Wiles Biscuit Company are preparing a special "Beauty Biscuit" for the party, while the Plato Art Company is getting up some small silk pennants for each girl to carry, bearing the coat-of-arms of her state. To stimulate interest in the contest, Joseph Rosenthal, of the firm of M. Rosenthal & Son, the largest theatrical jewelers in New York City, is presenting a beautiful, large loving cup to the girl chosen as the most beautiful girl in the United States. This cup is now being exhibited in the window of James's Drug Store, Broadway and Forty-sixth street, New York City.

As an illustration of the seriousness with which the contest is being handled by the newspapers throughout the country, many of the papers are planning fetes in honor of the winner in their states. The Boston Traveler is going to hold a "Beauty Ball" some evening shortly after the announcement of the winner is made, while the Birmingham News is planning the "Alabama Beauty Ball," which is going to be held in the largest hall in Birmingham on May 12, and which will be attended by the Governor of Alabama, who will announce on that occasion the winner of the contest in that state.

For the judges who will decide the winner in some of the states some of the most prominent men and women in public life have been chosen to act on the committees. In Boston the Traveler has Governor David I. Walsh, acting as chairman, and he is assisted by James Allen, president of the Boston Art Commission, and Raymond Crosby, the famous illustrator on the staff of Life. Ella Wheeler Wilcox is acting as one of the judges for the New Haven Union, while Henry J. Falk, one of the biggest men in the state of Colorado, is going to decide who is the most beautiful girl in that state for the Denver Post.

No effort has been spared to enlist some of the most prominent women in the country to act as chaperones for the party on their trip to the Pacific Coast, and the Universal desires to assure the parents of the winners that the girls will be perfectly safe from the time they leave home until they return.

Those who are going to serve on this committee are: Mrs. Champ Clark, wife of the Speaker of the House of Representatives; Mrs. Frances Wayne, a well-known literary woman of Denver, who is the daughter of the late James B. Belford, one time Justice of the Supreme Court of Colorado and the first representative of Colorado in Congress, and who married the grand-nephew of the Revolutionary hero; Mrs. Pauline Smart, one of the most prominent club women of Cleveland, who has many social connections in the state of Ohio and whose mother was a cousin of President Arthur; Mrs. C. B. Bryan, of Memphis, one of the most prominent social leaders in the South, and Mrs. Anne Cummins Frye, of Boston, who is one of the best-known literary women in New England and a member of the literary colony of Scituate and a prime favorite among such people as Will Irwin, Franklin P. Adams, Boardman Robinson, Inez Haynes Gillmore, Sam Merwin, Leroy Scott and other equally well-known writers.

MOVING PICTURES IN MADISON SQUARE GARDEN.

Madison Square Garden will be transformed into a moving picture auditorium, the largest in the world, to seat 8,000 people.

The Arena Amusement Co., which has been organized to further the project with Mr. R. Preszburg, President, and Julius Hopp, Manager, has taken the use of the Garden and plans are in preparation to give a combination of the best there is in the moving picture world, combined with symphonic music, vocal and instrumental soloists and new features of attraction which will make the performances in Madison Square Garden overtop everything hitherto attempted in the moving picture line.

The first performances will take place about May 15th. Preparations are now being made to transform the arena into a moving picture auditorium. Newly invented apparatuses will be installed to create artificial breezes throughout the auditorium during the entire summer so as to make the Garden the coolest place in the city.

CASTLES IN CORT PICTURES.

Mr. and Mrs. Vernon Castle are going into pictures again, but not as exponents of the dance, as was the case when they were first shown on the screen. This time they are to be real characters in a big dramatic production which is to be put on soon by the Cort Film Corporation of which John Cort is president. It was announced from the offices of Mr. Cort in the Longacre building this week that he had signed contracts whereby Mr. and Mrs. Castle are to appear for him in a feature production of some length. The two dancers will take the part of society folk in the Cort production, and their ability to dance will be made incidental to the run of the story, which will shortly be announced as approaching the melodramatic in texture.

The producers for Mr. Cort are already working on the selection of a cast of well-known photoplay actors with which to surround the Castles in the picture. Work on the new production is scheduled to start about June first.

The Typical American Woman.

Hope Expressed That She May Be Discovered by the Mutual's "Runaway June" Contest.

WHILE the "Runaway June" contest now being conducted by the Mutual Film Corporation to select one woman from each of the forty-eight states of the Union who shall receive a free trip to California, will afford lots of excitement and friendly rivalry for the aspirants and their friends and, incidentally, a lot of fun for the lucky winners, there are hints of a deeper purpose underlying the whole plan that should bring to this contest the serious support of women in all walks of life.

The results of the contest should show the typical woman of each state. It will show not only her outward appearance, but her whole range of intellect, her likes and dislikes, her habitual moods, her favorite diversions and occupations and all the known facts of her existence. Hence the winners will be studied by experts from every possible angle. The determination of the true American types has already begun. While the finished contest will present the larger results, it is felt that a study of the early entrants is very much worth while. It is believed that a study of these will show how public taste forms its earlier judgments and how finally the complete judgment is shown in the winners.

So a force of statisticians and experts is now at work studying the data furnished by entrants and exhibitors who are running "Runaway June" and the contest in their theaters.

The experts examine full length photographs of the entrants, photo portraits and profile pictures. These are filed away with the reports of the examiners, while the results as a whole are carefully tabulated.

At the same time the other facts supplied regarding entrants are tabulated so that it can be seen at a glance whether the majority of the entrants are tall or little, slender or full figured, whether they are musicians, artists, writers or business women. So complete are the tabulations that it is entirely possible to tell at a glance whether blondes or brunettes are the most in favor.

These early studies are expected to reveal much concerning the American women; yet the greatest value will result when the forty-eight typical American women (or girls) are assembled for the first time in the history of the country. Each winner, in order to carry a state, must have the endorsement of large numbers of men and women. So each will be an exceptional person—exceptional in beauty, charm, talents or other characteristics. Out of the forty-eight those in charge of the contest will try to determine the typical American woman. A composite photograph of the forty-eight will be useful in giving some idea of the appearance of the typical American woman, while a statement of the talents, accomplishments and characteristics which the forty-eight have in common will reveal other facts about the undisputed type of American woman.

Jesse J. Goldberg, secretary and general manager of the Life Photo Film Corporation, has just returned from a trip to the middle west, where he has been in consultation with several Chicago capitalists for the purpose of seeking additional backing in order to increase the output of that company of five part features from one a month to four a month.

The officers of the Life Photo Film Corporation were rather reticent in giving out the details of their new plans but enough was gleaned to state that an announcement will be made in the course of the next week or ten days which will place the Life Photo Film Corporation far in advance as a feature producing concern.

Mr. Goldberg leaves Saturday, the 23rd inst., for a trip to Los Angeles, there to commence operations looking toward the erection of a studio in that city or its suburbs in order to provide for such increased output, in addition to which another studio will be built by the company in New York City, or its suburbs.

The Life Photo Film Corporation will continue its policy of producing adaptations from successful stage dramas with legitimate stage stars in the lead.

SPEDON ADDRESSES QUILL CLUB.

The Quill Club held a meeting on Tuesday evening, April 20th, at the Hotel Manhattan, New York. S. M. Spedon, of the Vitagraph Company of America, addressed the club on the subject of moving pictures. Mr. Spedon has been connected with the motion picture industry for a number of years, and he had some interesting revelations to make regarding the animated art.

Virginia Pearson.

VIRGINIA PEARSON, a popular Vitagraph player, comes from one of the oldest families in the South. Her mother, who was Mary Alice Calloway, being a descendant of those famous Calloways who helped blaze the trail of civilization when white men first began their conquering march Westward. Miss Pearson was born on March 7, 1888, in Louisville, Ky., where she lived until the call of the theater took her to New York City. Both Miss Pearson's father, Joseph, and her mother were born in Louisville, Mr. Pearson descending from a long line of painters and writers, well known in England. Miss Pearson received her education in the public schools of her native city, graduating with honors from the Commercial High School. She then became assistant librarian of the Booklovers' Library in Louisville, which position she held until a contract, signed by Henry W. Savage, gave her her first glimpse of stage life. Although the play in which she made her first personal appearance was not a financial success, Miss Pearson was commended for her excellent work.

Virginia Pearson.

Following in the footsteps of a number of other professionals, Miss Pearson became a motion picture actress to fill in the summer between seasons, and liked the work so well she was about tempted to sign with the Vitagraph company for an indefinite period, when flattering offers from influential managers and "the call of the road" outweighed her determination to continue posing in front of the camera and the theater won for the time being. Miss Pearson's present engagement is her third in motion pictures and her second with the Vitagraph Company. Previous screen stories in which Miss Pearson appeared for the Vitagraph include: "An Unfair Game," "Mrs. Barrington's House Party," "On the Doorstep," etc., and at present she is at work on "The Turn of the Road," which is significant, as she has definitely made up her mind to continue as a motion picture actress.

JOKE ON LOWRY.

Ira M. Lowry, general manager of the Lubin Company, had a good laugh on himself last week while making one of his quick runs, in his high-powered automobile, between the Lubin studio in Philadelphia and the Lubin ranch at Betzwood, Pa. On one of the trips last week he had with him one of the Lubin cameramen and Edward L. Simons, the Lubin electrical expert. Several miles outside of Philadelphia Mr. Lowry stopped his car very suddenly. A short distance ahead by the side of a railroad track was a large crowd of excited men and women surrounding something that Mr. Lowry couldn't see. Policemen were trying to drive the crowd back; hospital attendants were lifting people into ambulances and there was considerable confusion.

Mr. Lowry told the cameraman to set up his camera as fast as possible and get some pictures and then dashed over to see if there was anything he himself could do to help. Just as he reached the crowd he saw John Ince, one of his own directors, shouting directions through a megaphone to a crowd of his own players. Mr. Lowry got the bigest surprise he's had in some time. He had walked in, or rather, driven in, on "Road o' Strife" company at work on some exterior scenes, and when he had shaken hands with Ince, Crane Wilbur, Mary Charleson, Jack Standing and some of the other players, he laughingly explained to them that they had completely fooled him by the realistic way in which they were filming the train wreck.

EXCHANGE MANAGER DIES FROM INJURIES.

Charles D. Mattingly, general manager of the Universal Film Exchange at Oklahoma City, Okla., died on Tuesday, April 20, from injuries received in an automobile accident on Easter Sunday. Resolutions of respect were adopted by the members of the trade in Oklahoma City.

Geraldine Farrar for the Screen.

The Great Operatic Star, Fresh from Her Triumphs at the Metropolitan, Enters into a Contract with Lasky—A Forecast of Her Future in the Realm of Motion Pictures.

By W. Stephen Bush.

THE Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company has engaged Geraldine Farrar, whose contract with the Metropolitan Opera Company has just been renewed after a series of rare artistic and personal triumphs which came to a climax at her last public appearance when the opera-going public of New York tendered the young and accomplished artiste an ovation the like of which has been seldom seen here or elsewhere.

So great is the distance between the operatic stage and the life on the screen—so different are the activities and the atmospheres of these two forms of entertainment—that the questions: Who is Geraldine Farrar? What has she done? are in these columns not as unpardonable as they must seem to the army of Miss Farrar's admirers and devotees. I say "army" advisedly. The voice of our American "Diva" has not only been heard in silent and in lively thankfulness on all the great operatic stages of Europe, but the sweet, rich and firm strains of her song have delighted the tens of thousands of homes where the touch of a simple mechanism sets the record of the peerless voice floating upon the air.

Geraldine Farrar.

Geraldine Farrar, you will say then, is an operatic star of the first magnitude; millions delight to listen when she sings either in person or by record; but how will Geraldine Farrar enrich the lore of the screen? I might here break forth into exclamations than which there is nothing cheaper either in rhetoric or in journalism; I might say with all the thoughtless impulsiveness of enthusiasm that the name of Geraldine Farrar must be a name to conjure with; but I fear I might not be convincing. Happily, I can build my message of cheer to the exhibitor upon far better foundations than an indefinite optimism. Do not think then that this plan of the great singer to enter the realm of the newest art came over night or that it is simply the half reluctant acceptance of a vast sum of money by an artist with a proper sense for profits.

Miss Farrar loves the screen. At first, its attraction to her came through curiosity; curiosity gave way to study; study resulted in love and devotion. The new art woke an echo in the soul of the artist. How little do we of the plain and common mould know of the passion which Nature stirs in the heart of the artist—the passion to please, to delight, to uplift mankind, to lure it away from the sordid and the commonplace and force it into a glimpse of the divine. Can we doubt that the motion picture is capable of stirring such a passion in a soul of the type of Geraldine Farrar? Next to the entry of Belasco into the domain of films; next to the conversion of that distinguished apostle of American dramatic art to the claims of the screen, the resolution of this marvelously gifted young woman to employ her talents in the attaining of success in the films is the greatest step in advancing the dignity of the motion picture, in freeing it from the bane of prejudice, in winning for it the good opinion of the public.

I cannot tell you in what pictures Miss Geraldine Farrar will appear, nor could she herself tell you at this moment. If it were a mere question of exploiting the advertising value of a great name, I would at once yield the floor to the diligent publicity man, whose program would of course be ready to the slightest detail. That I cannot do it and that no publicity man is asked to do it for you is the best and surest sign of the progress we have made in these last two or three years and of the high plane that we have reached at last. As it required months of thought and consideration to mature this engagement, so it will require more months to mature the work itself. The question is simply this: How can the great gifts possessed by Miss Farrar be utilized to make them shine in their greatest brilliancy on the screen? That Miss Farrar possesses histrionic talents of the highest order and of a particularly sweet and subtle kind all will agree who have seen her work as "Marguerite," as "Carmen" and as "Madame Butterfly." In the hundred minor but exacting parts her talents have been made manifest even more plainly, for she has made these parts and really endued them with life and spirit. In person, Miss Farrar has all the qualities of an actress—face, form and a personal charm, with a sympathetic insight which enables her to see beyond the page and feel the character she portrays. She is a handsome young woman, full of animation and spirit. The fun-loving propensities of girlhood, the exquisite roguishness of feminine youth, have not been lost during years of rigorous training. She is still eager, captivating and buoyant. Miss Farrar's face is one of marked mobility. Her facial expression, her repose are all eloquent and seem singularly suited to the camera. Her intuitive perception of the finest shades of dramatic art has been the wonder and delight of the great and critical audiences of Europe.

Geraldine Farrar is an American girl. Don't we all like to hear that? She has brought back from her conquests in Europe all that was worth learning—and there was much, to be sure. She gave to Europe more, however, than she took away. The ingenuousness of the true American girl, the modest freedom, the charm of innocence, the gay laughter of unspoiled girlhood which sounds so well to us and so magical to the ears of Europe—all these blessed things the young woman has brought back with her in undiminished and unimpaired form.

Given these wonderful materials, given a corps of sympathetic film experts, given the young woman's own artistic intuition, the counsels of her own perceptive soul, are we not entitled to expect great things, plays that are worth while and that must make new records in the upward trend? Will you still insist on the "release dates" and on the names of the plays? Are you not satisfied, after all, to trust to the elements of success which need but little welding? There will be, I dare say, many a conference and many an hour of hard work, for the gods have set the sweat before the crown. The aspiration lives in the young singer's heart and will open the fonts of inspiration.

Now that we have looked at the large aspect of the new departure, I will not withhold the news and the gossip. It is said that negotiations between Miss Farrar and the Lasky interests have been in progress for seven months or more; it is also said that the great artiste is to be compensated for her work at the rate of two dollars per minute while she keeps the camera busy.

The contract between the Lasky company and Miss Farrar by arrangement with Mr. Gest covers a period of several seasons. Miss Farrar will spend exactly eight weeks working for the Lasky company this season.

I have not stated the most curious of all the facts surrounding "our heroine." She was born in an old Puritan sort of town—Melrose, to be exact—in the state of Massachusetts, the home and citadel of draped art. Her ancestry is of the Mayflower variety. One of her well-meaning biographers speaks of the "artistic impulses bred in her by the spiritual environment of the old New England village." Well, she survived the environment, and that is about all for Melrose. The years of work and training led from Melrose to Boston, from Boston to New York and thence to the artistic centres of the Old World. She has been a favorite of the operatic stage of Europe in Paris, Berlin, Moscow, Munich, Vienna.

I think the good genius of the motion picture smiled on the day she gave her heart to the screen.

VITAGRAPH ENGAGES WILLIAM COURTENAY.

Contracts calling for the appearance in moving pictures of William Courtenay, now appearing in "Under Cover," have been signed by that popular actor and the Vitagraph Company of America. Mr. Courtenay, whose Broadway successes have been many, and who created a large following during his seasons in vaudeville, will be seen on the moving picture screen in a number of roles that have especially been written for him. He will be a welcome addition to the all star company of the Vitagraph Company which is now featuring Robert Edeson, Frank Daniels, Virginia Pearson, Joseph Kilgour, Earle Williams, Anita Stewart, Lillian Walker, Edith Storey, Antonio Moreno, Maurice Costello, Charles Richman and many others.

Octavia Handworth With Lubin

OCTAVIA HANDWORTH, widely known for her good looks and versatility as an actress, is the latest leading woman to join the Lubin players, and is to be featured in a number of dramas especially suitable to her type. Miss Handworth has had a long and thorough training as an actress—six years of her professional life having been spent in pictures and thirteen years on the legitimate stage. Miss Handworth was born in New York, but most of her girlhood days were spent in Copenhagen, Denmark, where she was educated in all the arts. When she returned to America she took a post-graduate course at the Brooklyn Conservatory of Music and then did concert work. Miss Handworth achieved quite a reputation as a soprano and concert pianist and was making rapid strides ahead in her work when she was suddenly taken dangerously ill. It was months before she was able to leave her bed, and during those months she completely lost her singing voice.

Octavia Handworth.

Lew Fields persuaded Miss Handworth to go on the stage and gave her a part in one of the Weber and Fields shows. From then on she played in a long list of dramatic productions. Eight years ago she was not only leading woman, but directing the Dallas Stock Company at Dallas, Texas. Six years ago Miss Handworth went into pictures and discovered that the screen was the best medium of all for the expression of her artistic ideals. She has been in pictures ever since and has played leading roles in a number of different companies not only in this country but abroad as well.

Miss Handworth is a type well adapted for photoplays. She is tall, gray-eyed, blonde, with unusually well modelled features, and a rythmic grace that denotes much time spent out of doors in athletic pursuits. Miss Handworth is enthusiastic over golf, tennis, skeeing, swimming, iceboating and long distance walking. As an actress she has achieved success through her hard work, her enthusiasm and her versatility.

Anna Luther

ANNA LUTHER, who has just joined the Selig Pacific Coast stock companies as a leading lady, is certainly a dainty mite of femininity. She was born in Newark, N. J., twenty years ago, and entered the art of motion picture acting as the result of a wager. The work fascinated her and within six months she was undertaking leading roles in the silent drama.

"I'm going to stay in the motion pictures forever," said Little Miss Anna Luther in a recent interview and she showed her pearly white teeth in a fascinating laugh.

Anna Luther.

Anna Luther is known as the little lady who is not afraid to take a chance. She is ready and willing to undertake any "stunt" that will add realism to the pictures and the chief source of worry to the Director for whom she is working is to curb her adventurous spirit. In one motion picture drama she was thrown from a yacht in mid-ocean. She has made ascensions in aeroplanes, did a parachute drop, and loves to swim and shoot and fish for sea bass.

The accomplished little lady has a wealth of auburn hair, has blue eyes, and tips the scales at 120 pounds. She has never engaged in the art of the spoken drama.

"I want to work in a Selig wild animal picture; I have never worked with the animals but I am anxious for the opportunity. I want to take a chance," said Anna Luther, and she smiled some more.

FREDOROVICZ BUILDING NEW THEATER.

T. K. Fredorovicz, who opened the Crystal theater in Hay City, Kansas, a little over a year ago, will give the public another amusement place by opening the Hays Opera House on July 4 next. The structure is being built at the corner of Fort and North Main streets, and the dimensions are 47 by 82 feet. It will be two stories in height, and will contain a balcony seating 400. The house will accommodate 1,000 persons. All the latest improvements will be installed in the new theater. Prior to the establishment of the Crystal theater, there was not an amusement place in the town of Hay City, but Mr. Fredorovicz was keen enough to observe that the public would support a picture house; hence the "birth" of the Crystal. Constant study of the condition of things in his town also decided Mr. Fredorovicz to build the opera house.

Mr. Fredorovicz has also demonstrated that he is imbued with the spirit of philanthropy. Recently he had at his Crystal what was known as "Tag Day," and the event proved to be a big success. On that occasion the entire receipts for the day were contributed to the hospital committee. The picture booked was the six-part Universal Special Feature, entitled "Samson," and the amount taken in was $272.25. This beneficent undertaking will be an annual event, according to Mr. Fredorovicz, and will take place during the second week after Easter.

The Motion Picture Exhibitor

NEW ORGANIZATION IN LOUISIANA.

Motion Picture Exhibitors Get Together in New Orleans.

AN ASSOCIATION of Louisiana moving picture exhibitors was formed last week at a meeting held in the Green Room of the Grunewald Hotel. New Orleans exhibitors were well represented at the meeting. At a second meeting, scheduled for April 25, it is expected that the membership will be largely increased, a number of country exhibitors having signified their intention of coming in at that time.

The following officers were elected: Martin L. Costley, Jr., president; Frank Davis, vice-president; E. Saik, treasurer, and B. F. Brennan, secretary. The business of the organization is to be conducted by an executive committee of nine members meeting weekly, the association to come together in general meeting monthly. The meeting of organization was enthusiastic, auguring well for the future of the organization; refreshments were served.

It will be the purpose of the association to look after the interests of the exhibitor in particular, and the welfare of the picture industry in general. The reason for the formation of the organization at this time, President Costley said, was that the exhibitors, the middlemen, found themselves between two other organizations, the operators and the exchangemen, and believed that the formation of the association could not well be delayed without endangering the exhibitors' interests.

Aside from this consideration it was pointed out that while Louisiana has so far not been troubled with misguided legislation as to the picture business there is no guarantee that the state will continue its non-interference in this regard. It will be the purpose of the organization to watch over all picture legislation and see that as little, that is obnoxious as possible gets on the book.

Such situations as that arising from the action of the City Park Commissioner in establishing a censorship over plays to be produced in the City Park will also be looked after by the organization. The exhibitors watched the course of the fight against the City Park Commission in this regard, which resulted in the commission standing pat, with interest. Now, since it became apparent that the commission means to hold its ground, the exhibitors' association will add its protest to the others lodged with the commission regarding the censorship, addressing the commission, as representatives of the picture industry, at an early date.

GREAT DOINGS AT READING.

Preparations of an Extensive Nature Being Made for the Pennsylvania Convention.

THAT the Pennsylvania state convention and exhibit of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League is to be a great success is now evident. Reading, the capital of Berks county, where the sessions will be held Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday, June 7 to 9, inclusive, will be the center of attraction for hundreds of exhibitors and others identified with the film interests.

Convention Manager Ben H. Zerr, president of the Reading local and of the state body, is daily at his desk at headquarters wading through the heavy mail. In all probability the exhibit room will be taxed to its capacity with various displays. A crowd of visitors at the exposition is more than assured, judging from the numerous requests for tickets of admission from patrons of the various theaters.

Rajah Temple, where the convention will be held, consists of two floors. The lower one will be used for the exhibit, while the upper part will be devoted to entertainment of various kinds.

Mr. Zerr is compiling an extremely neat booklet of over fifty pages, to be sold. Embossed on the front cover will be an illustration of one of the large pretzels for which Reading is famed. The word "pretzel" as well as the real article will play a conspicuous part at the convention.

The Reading local is arranging to hold a grand ball on Tuesday evening during the exhibit. This will be one of the most unique affairs of its kind ever held in the state. Many of the screen favorites have been invited to attend, and already numerous acceptances have been received.

On Monday evening a "Dutch lunch" will be given the visitors, and a banquet will mark the close of the affair on Wednesday night. At the latter it is expected to have as guests Governor Brumbaugh and other state officials; also Mayor Stratton of Reading and his cabinet.

One of the treats to be enjoyed will be the demonstration promised by "Pop" Lubin, who has agreed to send one hundred or more of his players, bringing to the city on a "special." They will be accompanied by the Lubinville band. Arrangements for the Lubin delegation have been placed in the hands of Mr. Lubin's efficient and congenial publicity representative, J. Allen Boone. Mr. Zerr, accompanied by Frank A. Gould, state publicity representative for the league, visited the Lubin studio in Philadelphia, where they were cordially received and assured that the Lubin people would do everything possible towards making the Reading convention a success.

While the exhibitors are in session there will be entertainment aplenty for the visitors' wives and friends. The delegates will be conveyed over the mountain railways and participate in the parade on Tuesday afternoon.

Among the exhibitors who are active in the arrangements include J. G. Hansen, Carr & Schad, Frank D. Hill, L. C. Bright, Smith & Kantner, Chas. Graul, L. B. Reinert, Charles L. Snyder and Hen Johnston.

BIG CENSOR FIGHT ON.

Massachusetts Exhibitors Putting Up Hard Battle Against Proposed Legislation.

THE fight of the Massachusetts Motion Picture Exhibitors' League against the proposed censorship bill has now assumed vast proportions. Several petitions are in circulation and these will be presented to the legislature. The committee in charge of these comprises J. A. Eslow, manager of the New England Universal Exchange; A. F. Washburn, of the Unique theater, Boston; Mrs. Carroll; James Burke, president of the operators' union, and E. O. Ramsdell, of Melrose.

A short hearing was given on the bill by the members of the Senate Committee on Ways and Means. As the time of the committee was limited, owing to a session of the Senate, only three speakers were heard, former Assistant U. S. Attorney General William H. Lewis and Butler R. Wilson, both colored, in favor and Orrin G. Cocks, advisory secretary of the National Board of Censorship, in opposition.

Mr. Lewis declared that there was a public necessity for such a bill. A motion picture, he said, is a thing manufactured by some film factories, and the only idea of producing it is to get up something that will sell. It is nothing to the manufacturer whether the play is immoral or obscene, being purely a business proposition. The general public welfare requires that there should be some authority to pass upon the films before they are shown. Congress has passed a bill recently prohibiting the production of the recent fight films and simply on the ground that it would tend to raise race prejudice.

Mr. Wilson suggested that the censorship be placed in the hands of the district police rather than in the hands of the State Board of Labor and Industries, for the former was more familiar with such matters and has always shown good judgment.

Mr. Cocks opposed the measure from the viewpoint of the expert censor, and told the committee of the work which the national board is now carrying on. He said that the question of censorship involved the possible criticism of 7,000 or 8,000 distinct subjects which must be considered from all sides and especially from that of public opinion. He said that where the subjects touched upon the real things of life it was inevitable that there should be some degree of contention and that the board could not decide upon pictures from the standpoint of personal whim. It is essential, he added, that there should be commonsense criticism. When asked how the Ohio and Pennsylvania laws work, he replied that it was impossible to view pictures day in and day out with a fresh mind and that in those states the films were not half censored. The hearing was then continued until another date.

MINNESOTA CONVENTION CHANGE.

Meetings and Exposition Will Be Held in the West Hotel Instead of Arcadia Hall.

Announcement is made by the committee in charge of the Minnesota Exhibitors' Association convention that the meetings for exhibitors and the exposition for the trade will be held in the West Hotel, Minneapolis, Minn., instead of Arcadia Hall as previously announced. By arrangement with the West Hotel, firms making exhibits may commence work on their displays on Saturday, May 1, two days before the convention, and the displays may remain in the hall until Saturday, May 8.

Reports indicate that this meeting will be an eventful one. President Pearce, of the National League, has indicated his intention of being present, and other leading exhibitors throughout the northwest territory are expected. An interesting program has been prepared for the business sessions and plenty of entertainment will be provided for visitors.

No change has been made in the date of the convention which is May 3 to 7.

REV. CLARENCE J. HARRIS AGREES WITH THE WORLD.

All of the theater owners and managers of Oklahoma City and many of those of the State, know the Rev. Clarence J. Harris, who is always ready to go before the public in the interests of the motion picture art. He fought with the theater managers through two fierce battles in Oklahoma with the Legislature of two sessions, and won both times, and he is ready to fight again in the interests of sane censorship as opposed to the form of censor hysteria which is constantly being practiced by so called society and social leaders.

With the Moving Picture World Mr. Harris agrees that many well meaning men and women have been influenced to believe that a legalized censorship of motion pictures is necessary. They have come to regard pictures as unlike anything else in the country and therefore demanding a peculiar restraint. A little thought will show that the themes used in pictures are precisely those presented on the speaking stage, in books, magazines and newspapers. They are merely adapted to another medium. If censorship is sanctioned in one instance there is no sound argument to offer against its being sanctioned in others. Yet few Americans would contemplate censored books, censored magazines, or a censored press, without concern. If the precedent is once established, it is difficult to foretell what form of repression it may lead to in future years.

Mr. Harris is not only opposed to the censor principal as urged by so called leaders, but he is also decidedly against the closing of the theater on Sundays. He feels so strongly the abuse that has been directed against the theater managers on these two subjects that he does not miss an opportunity to come to the front as an able champion of motion pictures and present the strongest kind of logical arguments against their misinformed enemies.

The Rev. C. J. Harris is the author of "The Spender," a powerful two-reel drama which will be presented on the United Program May 19.

PHOTOPLAY AUTHORS' LEAGUE ELECTION.

The first annual meeting of the Photoplay Authors' League passed off smoothly, the prevalent opinion being that the league had fully justified its existence and had done splendid work in its first twelve months of endeavor.

Frank E. Woods was re-elected president, Russell E. Smith, vice-president, and Richard Willis, treasurer. Richard Harding Davis is the second vice-president, and William Lord Wright, the third vice-president. Hettie Gray Baker is secretary and Mary O'Connor, David Griffith and W. E. Wing fill up the governing board.

KLEIST ACTING PRESIDENT.

August Kleist, of Pontiac, is acting as president pro tem of the Detroit Motion Picture Exhibitors meetings which are held every Tuesday afternoon in the league's club rooms. Herbert Fowser, officially the president, is now salesman with the United Film Service company, and hence will not be able to give the office the full attention it requires.

Edward Connelly in a Rolfe Picture

B. A. ROLFE announces the signing of contracts between the company bearing his name and the famous writer, George Ade, by which Mr. Rolfe comes into possession of the screen rights to the author's celebrated play and book, "Marsa Covington," which, as a play and as a novel enjoyed the widest vogue, and in the pictorial production the Rolfe people will have the aid of George Ade, who will work on the scenario and as star and leading players, Edward Connelly, who originated the role of Marsa. Covington in the play, Mr. Connelly is one of the best delineators of the Southern type now playing, and his selection by the Rolfe people of the role of Marsa Covington is a happy one, to say the least.

Edward Connolly.

"Marsa Covington" will be staged at the Rolfe studios, Yonkers, and work will be begun there at once. The exteriors will be staged at various places in the Southern States, mentioned by the author in the original manuscript. Two reels will be made at Valdosta, Georgia. The old Piney Woods Hotel at Thomasville will be used for the big dancing set and the landing at Vicksburg, Mississippi, will be used as a background for numerous climaxes. The Mississippi River steamboat, "Water Queen," has been leased by General Manager Karger for two weeks, and the company supporting Mr. Connelly will travel from St. Louis down to New Orleans, making the scenes en route. Local color and atmospheric detail will be faithfully carried out. George Ade will make the trip down stream with the players.

STRAND THEATER BILL.

The bill at the Strand Theater for the week of May 2 is headed by two big features, "The Woman," a drama of American political life, showing the manner in which the element of scandal may be introduced into politics for the injury of those people who are truly fighting for right and justice. The film adaptation was produced by Jesse L. Lasky and David Belasco, under the direction of Cecil B. DeMille, the author. The other big feature is the third and last presentation at this theater of Dr. Edward A. Salisbury, the noted sportsman and naturalist, and his wild life pictures. The Strand Topical Review this week contains besides the news pictures, a newly arrived lot of European war pictures. Other screen attractions are a new Keystone Comedy and some beautiful and interesting travel and scientific pictures.

WORLD FILM BUILDS OUTDOOR STAGE.

The new outdoor stage connected with the World Film studios at Fort Lee, N. J., is nearing completion, but though it is as yet unfinished it has already become popular with the directors. The first director to use this stage was Frank H. Crane, who took a scene for "An Indian Diamond," Monday, April 19. No sooner had his set been struck when Albert Capellani immediately took posssession and staged a big scene from "The Face in the Moonlight." The outdoor stage when completed will be 60 feet long and 30 feet wide. It will be joined both to the studio and to the storehouse by special runways, to facilitate the quicker shifting of scenery. It is expected that this stage will become very popular in the hot summer days.

WARNING AND REWARD.

Do not purchase these two reels, "Battle of Bunker Hill," Edison, and "Paul Revere's Ride," Edison, left on the Gates Avenue car, Brooklyn, or on the N. Y. to Brooklyn subway train Monday evening, April 26th. Suitable reward for return to Educational Department, General Film Company, 71 West 23d Street, New York City.

CHICAGO LETTER

BY JAS. S. McQUADE

Rights of Photoplay Authors Versus Magazine Publishers Who Fictionize Their Plots Without Compensation.

THE time has come when the photoplay author must protect his rights against invasion, with just as great persistence and vigor as displayed by authors and publishers of fiction in protecting their rights. If a photoplay author commits a breach of copyright, he and the buyer of his script soon feel the weight of the mailed fist of the owner of that copyright; but if he conceives an original plot, writes the story in photoplay form and sells his script to a manufacturer, very seldom does he get credit for originating the photoplay story by magazine publishers, who use his plot in fictionized form in their publications without giving the photoplay author any compensation.

I have recently read an important pronouncement on the injustice done the photoplay author in this respect, the writer being quite fair in his attitude, so far as I can judge. He says: "The author's brain conceived the story originally. He sells, presumably, only a photoplay—not a fiction story—to the manufacturer. In the first place, where has the manufacturer secured the right to sell or give that plot to any magazine for fictionizing purposes? Of course, some manufacturers may cover that point in their release slips which the author signs. In any event, the entire transaction is utterly unfair to the author.

"The publications and the manufacturers, who make such use of a photoplay story, place themselves in the same category as the man who would take any magazine story and from that plot construct a play and sell or produce it without compensation to the original author. The story is the same, only in another form. Thus it is with the fictionized photoplay. The plot is conceived by one author, produced by a manufacturer who pays for the privilege, and fictionized by another sort of publisher who does not pay for the privilege—at least he does not pay the author of that plot. He has to pay another author to fictionize it.

"But what will magazine publishers do if they cannot get any stories from the manufacturers unless they pay the author for the right to fictionize them? If it comes to a show-down, will the manufacturer rather favor his photoplay writer upon whom he depends for the stories he must have in order to make any pictures, or on the magazines of the type mentioned, to whom he owes nothing but a little publicity and upon whom he depends for nothing whatever?

"In a great many cases the photoplay author is also a writer and seller of magazine fiction, and he certainly will not allow his magazine sales to be killed by a 'fictionizing' in other publications, especially, as is often the case, if it is badly done.

"Personally, I often get from fifty to a hundred and fifty dollars for a short story. Yet, when I sell that plot as a photoplay, I get a hundred or more dollars for it, and (if I let it!) it gets fictionized and these magazines only pay twenty-five dollars to have it done! What's the answer to that?"

Harper-Church Contest Goes to Supreme Court.

The struggle for supremacy between the Harper theater and the Hyde Park Presbyterian Church trustees is still on, although the hopes of the present owner of the theater were raised sky high on Friday, April 23, when Judge Lockwood Honore, of the Circuit Court, overruled a demurrer filed by the city of Chicago to a petition for a writ of mandamus brought by Frank Nahser, who is seeking a permit to open the house.

In giving his opinion, Judge Honore made a distinction between amusements that are nuisances and those that are not. He held that in the case of nuisances the city, since it may by statute prohibit them altogether, may localize them; but that in the present instance the power to localize does not exist.

"If at any time this theater should put on a play that was a nuisance, it could be abated," the Judge said, "but the statute does not give the city power to prohibit exhibitions of all kinds."

But the city halted this seeming victory for the Harper theater by a counter move. An appeal was taken by the city to the Supreme Court, and a stay order was entered by Judge Honore delaying execution of the mandamus until the Supreme Court decides. The final action thus far was taken Saturday, April 24.

If Judge Honore's decision stands, lawyers say, it will affect saloons also. The identical section of the statute empowering the city to abate nuisances and upon which the church-theater law is based, is the section under which the city has kept saloons 200 feet away from schools and churches. There is no specific ordinance setting the limitation for saloons. Application of the 200-foot rule to them is merely a custom and actually lies in the discretion of the mayor. Should the higher courts uphold Judge Honore's interpretation and decide that an orderly saloon is not a nuisance, a saloon could only be declared a nuisance after it had opened and after evidence had been adduced that it had been operated objectionably.

Savage Cuts Theater Prices One-Half.

"Along Came Ruth," one of Henry W. Savage's comedies, opened at the Olympic theater, this city, Sunday evening, April 25, at prices ranging from $1 downwards.

The management of the local house had informed Mr. Savage that it had become the usual practice in Chicago to issue rebate tickets which entitle the holder to two seats for the price of one. But Mr. Savage wrote back:

"Although I have sold a number of my plays to moving picture producers after they have outworn their usefulness on the regular dramatic stage, my interest and ambitions are all concerned with the theater proper and not with motion pictures. I have no fear that motion pictures will ever supersede the regular drama, but they are certainly proving a detriment at this time.

"To meet this competition, I am willing to offer them a $2 production for $1 flat."

A local representative of one of the most prominent dramatic producers denies that there has ever been a scale of two tickets for the price of one, but that a coupon system has been in force which permitted the use of graded "lists," these "lists" being used when the occasion demanded it; as when, for instance, a No. 2 company followed the run of No. 1. In such a case the coupons referred to entitled the bearers to a rebate of 50 cents a seat on all reservations which formerly cost from $2 to $1. All the local managers of first class houses have followed the same system, under similar circumstances, but in no case have they sold two tickets for the price of one.

Chicago Film Brevities.

The Selig Polyscope Company moved from the old quarters at 20 East Randolph street, on Thursday, April 22, to the new quarters on the twelfth floor of the Garland Building, on the northeast corner of Washington street and Wabash avenue. The company had occupied the old quarters for over seven years. The new quarters are much more spacious than the old, and, when all the appointments are made, will present a fine appearance. The new private theater in the present quarters will seat 100 people.

The Chicago offices of the V. L. S. E., Inc., are on the second floor of the building on the southeast corner of Adams street and Wabash avenue. I. Van Ronkel, district manager for the organization, was seen one day last week and stated that everything in the office would be in good shape in another week. He reported many calls and 'phone inquiries regarding the feature subjects that will be handled. Everything points to a big demand for these film subjects.

Mr. and Mrs. Tyrone Power left for Los Angeles Thursday evening, April 22, to join the Selig forces there.

Wm. J. Sweeney has informed this office that the convention of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association of the Northwest will be held at the West Hotel, Minneapolis, instead of Arcadia Hall, from May 3 to 7.

Dr. George B. Young, the retiring health commissioner of Chicago, has called attention to the fact that the last two theaters fought by the health department, because of poor ventilation, had given up the contest and that the fight for clean air in moving picture theaters had been won by his department. The health commissioner recited several cases where the police failed to lend the proper support to his department by refusing to arrest managers who had failed to pay fines for violations of the law. Dr. John Dill Robertson has been endorsed by a meeting of 200 leading business men to succeed Dr. Young. The new mayor, Wm. Hale Thompson, was inaugurated Monday, April 26, and will immediately take action in making appointments.

Beginning the week of May 17, the Selig Polyscope Co. will discontinue the regular Friday release and issue, instead, every Thursday a three-reel Diamond Special through the General Film Company's regular program.

The management of the Strand Theater Company has issued special invitations to a press rehearsal of the first program to be given in Orchestra Hall, Friday evening, April 30. The program will open with an overture by Weber and a travelogue. "Along Florida Coast," will follow. The next number is a soprano solo, and after that the Strand symphony orchestra of 25 pieces will render "Bal-Scene." "Kittens at Play," projected in colors, will be next in order and will be succeeded by a quartet number, "My Lady Chlo." "The Woman," a feature drama directed by Belasco, will be next on the program, and will be followed by the violin solo, "Caprice Viennois." A comedy photoplay will close the program.

"The Avenging Conscience" continues its successful run at the Fine Arts theater.

The Studebaker is still drawing capacity crowds to view "The Eternal City."

At the Ziegfeld, "Niobe" and "The Poet of the Peaks" are occupying the screen for the current week.

On April 21 a bill was introduced in the House of Representatives which, if passed, will require every moving picture theater in Illinois to pay a state license fee of $100. This bill also provides for a state board of censors. The exhibitors of the state of Illinois should take action immediately to protect their rights. What with a state license and a municipal license on top of it, the exhibitor will be a very much taxed man.

The big theater scene in Selig's "Red Seal" feature, "The Millionaire Baby," that will be released May 31 through V. L. S. E., Inc., was made at the Selig Chicago studios, April 26. The big set was directed by Mr. Heffron, the new director. Several hundred "extra" people were engaged. Chicago society women drove to the studio in their taxicabs, in evening gowns, to act in the "society" scene. Representatives of the Chicago daily press were also present.

Alfred Hamburger has added the Willard theater, Calumet avenue and Fifty-first street, to his chain of theaters in this city. This makes the eleventh moving picture theater under his management. The Willard has been purchased from Jones, Linick & Schaefer. It has a seating capacity of 1,300 and is considered one of the best of the outlying theaters. It has been closed for redecoration and will be reopened Saturday, May 1.

One night last week some unknown person threw a malodorous bomb in the Kimbark theater, 6240 Kimbark avenue. At the time the house, which seats 700 people, was filled and there was a stampede to the street. Rival interests, not labor troubles, are held accountable by the management. The Kimbark is one of the largest new theaters in that district.

The new mayor, Wm. Hale Thompson, will have something to say about the showing of "The Birth of a Nation" in Chicago. Mr. Thompson spoke at the Institutional Church for Colored People on Sunday evening, April 25. Near the close of his address he said: "Two or three days ago two representatives of a motion picture concern came to me informally and said 'The Birth of a Nation' is to be shown at the Illinois theater at $2 prices, beginning May 3. Now, I am going to see that picture as soon as possible. If I find in it anything objectionable to my friends of this race, I cannot see how the film can be shown in Chicago."

John G. Hodgson, manager of the Oak Park theater, 130 Wisconsin street, is having a peck of trouble just now owing to rigorous censorship imposed on the films used by him, by Chief of Police George Lee and the village board president and other self-constituted censors. "The Outcast" and "A Modern Magdalene" were two of the films condemned by the aforesaid worthies. These pictures were passed by the Chicago board of censors, rigorous as the members are, but Chief Lee stated that while they might be all right for city folks to see, they were not for the people of Oak Park. "Not one of my patrons seemed dissatisfied with 'The Outcast'," said Mr. Hodgson. "Oak Park censors must be convinced that the people want these pictures. To convince them of this I am soliciting opinions through the village paper as to their desirability."

The prosperity inauguration parade attending the assumption of office by Chicago's new mayor, Wm. Hale Thompson, was the largest ever seen in the city, 75,000 people participating. Hundreds of thousands of people lined the streets along the line of march and all traffic in the "Loop" was suspended for over four hours. Moving pictures were taken by the camera men of several film companies. Those taken by the Selig Polyscope Co. were shown at a number of theaters throughout the city, the same evening. The Ziegfeld and Parkway, owned respectively by Alfred Hamburger and F. O. Nielsen, were among the houses that showed such films.

The Selig publicity department has evolved a special and extra method of adding publicity to the "Red Seal" product of that company. The Selig star in each case will write his or her own story of each "Red Seal" production. Miss Kathlyn Williams, for example, has already written her own story of the making of "The Carpet from Bagdad." The story in two columns, illustrated, will be released in plate and mat form by the Selig Co. An initial cut of Miss Williams will illustrate the printed matter. This feature story will be sent free to all newspapers, according to a well systematized plan. Other Selig stars will also write their experiences in "Red Seal" photoplays every month. Harry Mestayer, for instance, will write of his work in "The Millionaire Baby." Exhibitors will be requested to see the editors of their local newspapers and ask them to write the Selig Polyscope Co. for this new and interesting service. Upon receipt of a newspaper's address, the Selig Co. will mail or ship this feature publicity service free of all charge. It must be distinctly understood that these articles are in no sense advertising or press agent's stories, but inside information written by the film stars themselves, of their work in Selig "Red Seal" photoplays.

Herbert Case Hoagland, of Selig's publicity department, has issued an attractive booklet on the Selig Exposition Special, which will leave Chicago July 8. The sixteen pages of the book contain full information regarding the trip, including artistic illustrations showing the scenic beauties along the route taken by the Selig tourists. The cover of the booklet is unique and at once catches the eye.

SELIG POPULARITY CONTEST.

The Selig Polyscope Company reports unusual success with newspaper popularity contests in connection with the forthcoming trip of the Selig Exposition Special to California. Through the bright weekly newspaper now issued by the Selig Company under the title of "Pastepot and Shears," a newspaper popularity campaign was mapped out and special literature was sent to over one thousand newspapers and other publications in the United States and Canada. The returns have been unusually satisfactory. Up to date fifty newspaper popularity contests have been instituted by as many newspapers and other publications in the United States and Canada. Young women receiving the most votes are sent free to California on the Selig tour which starts July 8th from Chicago. Motion pictures of the journey will be made and shown by the newspapers which carried the contests. The Selig Company co-operates with the newspapers and furnishes a complete campaign. It seems to be a good circulation and advertising stimulus. These contests can be started at any time and thirty days is the duration.

BIG PLAYERS WITH V. L. S. E.

The Vitagraph-Lubin-Selig-Essanay, Inc., the "big four" of the motion picture producers, in announcing the first sixteen productions to be offered through their new affiliated booking offices, present a list of players that reads like a "who's who" in dramatics, and includes shining lights from both stage and studio.

Frank Daniels, Viola Allen, Tyrone Power, Anita Stewart, Earle Williams, Edwin Arden, Romaine Fielding, Francis Bushman, Beverly Bayne, Kathlyn Williams, Charles Clary, Wheeler Oakman, Ethel Clayton, George Soule Spencer, Edith Storey, Antonio Mareno, Ruth Stonehouse, Rose Coghlan, E. H. Calvert, Harry Mestayer and John Charles are names to conjure with and more are to come in the features that are now being produced at the different studios.

F. C. TAYLOR CONVICTED.

Frederick C. Taylor, who has conducted so-called "schools" for operators and actors in New York for several years, has been convicted of fraud in the court of Special Sessions for New York City, and was sentenced on Monday, April 26, to a term of nine months in the penitentiary. Taylor's "school" was at 201 West 42d Street, New York City.

Doings at Los Angeles.

THOMAS INCE was injured in an auto upset while going fast from Inceville to Hollywood Friday evening. He sustained two fractures to the collarbone and minor bruises and possible internal injuries. Complete recovery is certain. Wallace Reid, who was driving fast, collided with small machine, wrecking it. One man was killed, another seriously injured and three others bruised. Reid was held one night in jail, charged with manslaughter, but was bailed out next day and later released on his own recognizance.

The complete furnishings of W. W. Handman's Theater, comprising four hundred chairs, asbestos curtain, rug, electric equipment and sundry fixtures to the value of $1,000, were stolen. A reward was offered of $50 for information leading to the apprehension of the thief.

Positive evidence that the St. Andrews theater, which was partially destroyed by an explosion last week, was blown up by a dynamite bomb was secured a few days ago when a carpenter, working on the rebuilding of the playhouse, uncovered a section of gaspipe which was found under a seat, and was examined by a dynamite expert who said it was surely part of the destroyer of the building.

The Biograph Company entertained the several companies of players, a number of friends, and others, at the Venice dancing pavilion on the night of the 22nd. Dancing and handshaking were enjoyed until quite a late hour when a supper was served the several hundred merrymakers.

Instead of a midnight matinee or an owl overture run of a new picture, we have had a pre-view or before breakfast running of the new big serial, "The Diamond from the Sky," at the College Theater, the screening starting at 9.30. Many interested showmen were there, among them a prominent exhibitor from San Diego, J. O. La Perle, who runs the New Grand Theater in the southern city. The first showing of the "Flying A" thriller was by Charles E. Cochard, local representative of the North American Film Co. Newton E. Levi of the Mutual exchange was also present. Every one seemed to be highly interested in the $10,000 serial and most all present went away with intentions of booking the installment plan picture.

The Griffith masterpiece, "The Clansman," opens again at the Auditorium in its tenth week, after being circulated around the country for two weeks, while Ince's "The Sign of the Rose" was playing to capacity houses. One woman who saw the Beban play said afterwards that "you could hear purses snapping all the time, and there was hardly a person who did not use a handkerchief."

W. Fay Lynch, special representative of Essanay, is in town for two weeks. He brought down from Niles a company of players headed by Charles Chaplin, together with enough equipment to establish a new Los Angeles studio on the hill where the Albuquerque is located. The newly organized branch will probably be permanent. After looking over the field Mr. Lynch will go north to the fair, Portland and Seattle, returning east next month. Among those who are now busy here are Edna Purviance, new leading lady for Chaplin, Jesse J. Robbins, general producing manager; Harry Ensign, who exposes the film; Margie Rieger, Patty McGuire, Leo White, Bud Jamison, Harry Pollard, Bill Armstrong, William Gorham, M. A. Brislaeur, exploitation expert; Ernest Van Pelt, assistant director, and Ed. Armstrong. Fritz Wintermier, manager for the company, is also here, having located the studio. The address is 147 North Hill street.

The Traffic Men have come and gone from Universal City. There were many hundred members of the association together with their families who enjoyed the day's visit to the picture capital. The wild west show, rodeo, barbecue, and special comedy picture, in which every one played extra, made the day a pleasant one for the railroaders.

The circus is in town this week and several companies are doing scenes around the big top. One clown is "perfectly crazy" in a travesty make-up in imitation of Charlie Chaplin. Do pictures have their effect?

A local paper says that "Hobart Bosworth won a fight in the superior court yesterday on a technicality of interest to player folk." An employee sued to collect $80, two weeks' salary, contending he was not given the customary two weeks' notice. "Hobart Bosworth testified that the two weeks' notice does not prevail among film actors. The case was tried before Judge George L. Jones, of Nevada County, and Mr. Bosworth described Truckee (where the snow scenes were made) as a town with 39 saloons and one drug store. 'Wrong,' commented Judge Jones. 'Don't try to put anything like that over on the court. I hail from that locality. There are thirty-nine saloons and TWO drug stores there, sir.'"

Jesse L. Lasky again returned from the east early this week and brings lots of good news of his big firm. Fanny Ward, Laura Hope Crews and Victor Moore will arrive this week to start work.

You can't get away from the big champions. Baseball, and all the sports have to resort to film folk for their big drawing cards. This time it was Charlie Chaplin who led the parade when the baseball season opened with the Venice Tigers featured. A band, clowns, municipal men, calliope, and a hundred other things made up the big parade.

Quite a stir in local society circles was made when Mrs. Reginald Lloyd-Jones and her husband, social leaders wearying of sitting impassively in the film palaces, entered the film game with Al Kaufman and Mary Pickford. Many other society folk are deserting the dansant for the "film teas."

Seventeen hundred feet of film was given a screening this week at Santa Monica, one of the first municipalities to start filming school educational methods. Every branch of the polytechnic high school is shown. The films will be exhibited at the Fair this summer. The camera work was done by Will H. White.

One of the largest local cabarets is putting on a stage folks' night which will be followed by an evening with the picture players. The regular entertainers will enjoy a night off while the music and song will be furnished by the filmers who will put on all kinds of stunts for the amusement of their friends.

"M. B. Dudley," according to a local paper, "managing director of the Dudley M. P. Mfg. Co., of San Diego, came to the city yesterday and announced that he had completed arrangements for the building of a plant for his concern at National City, near San Diego, which is to be known as Dudleyville. One of the landmarks of National City, a large brick block, remodeled, will be the central feature of the new place. The company is a new one with capital of $50,000, and is officered by San Diego men."

Thomas Jefferson is playing Father White in "Up from the Depths," a four-reel Mutual picture which is featuring Gladys Brockwell, one of the latest recruits to this company. Courtenay Foote is also in the cast, playing with Miss Brockwell.

Lillian Peacock, youthful leading woman for Allen Curtis' Joker Universal company, is again at work after two months' away from the plant, occasioned by injuries received in the smashing of her automobile. Welcome back.

B. A. Molter, one of the Big U players, was painfully burned by powder when a salute was being fired for Vice-President Marshall when he visited the white city last week. The gun went off ahead of time, catching Molter when he did not expect it.

This week Anna Little did a great stunt when she rode horseback through flames and smoke on a narrow bridge which was extremely shaky. She got across safely, but the actor who rode with her was severely scorched.

"Army" Armstrong, cameraman with the Chaplin Keystone company, which returned from Mount Baldy this week, was shot twice by bullets which glanced from the face of a rock near which he was standing. The first wound was close to one eye, and the second was in the abdomen. Medical attention was quickly given the suffering man and a fatality was averted.

By the way, these last paragraphs, relating to accidents and some of the tasks that motion picture people are subject to, makes me grind my teeth when I hear some easy going merchant or office man exclaim when they see a picture man dressed up, "Say, I'd like to be a picture actor; they're all right. Pretty soft for them, nothin' to do till tomorrow," and many other like remarks. If the general public only really knew what these people have to do in film work (this is not too editorial, it is hoped); but remember Herbert Brenon, who was sieved through sharp cut glass while doing "Neptune's Daughter." Hospital for him for several months, six cuts by jagged glass, 63 stitches, and liquid diet most of the time. J. P. McGowan, director of Kalem railroad series, fell from a pole and was on his back for about three months, and that was before Christmas, and only this week was he pronounced fully recovered. Dorothy Gish, hit by an automobile and under nurse's care two months, and hundreds of minor accidents. Oh, but ignorance is bliss!

When the convention is held in San Francisco this summer, Los Angeles will be sadly in need of exhibitors, for they are already planning to spend a week at the fair to see the exhibits and be at the convention. Many of the local big bugs are planning to entertain before and after the big picture meet some of their friends from the far east.

Ray Myers and Giles R. Warren are two new directors at the Mutual. Warren comes from Seligs, while the former producer has risen from the Mutual ranks.

Mae Marsh has died again, making her 160th death scene. She ought to be featured as Little Eva. She says that her one trouble is that they always kill her before she gets a chance to do a lot of work, but, however, death is pleasant.

This week we have to report that Harry Bernard, Keystone comedian, is the proud possessor of a ten-pound daughter who arrived last week. Already Harry is preparing a kiddie wardrobe for the little Queen of the Pictures.

Pauline Bush is working in a picture, "Such Is Life," at the Universal, and in it she is seen in the kitchen a great deal. Funny, but she is going to be married in a few days; it must be true that "coming events cast their shadows."

There have been all kinds of scenario writers, but the latest is Dark Cloud, the well-known Indian actor of the Mutual. "The Converts" is the title of his story, and he is playing a prominent part in the picture.

We had noble visitors at the beach this week when Baron Victor Heyl and the Baroness Heyl enjoyed seeing Inceville, together with Mr. and Mrs. Judd of Minneapolis, and Miss Katherine Dameron of St. Louis, as guests of the World. All are summer visitors in the west and greatly enjoyed seeing the pictures made. The party met many of the stars, including Bessie Barriscale, Dustin Farnum, Lewis Cody, Mr. Ince, Walter Edwards and many others. They also saw Charlie Chaplin at work in Venice where the Essanay was doing a big funny film.

Mack Sennett performed a heroic deed this week although he modestly denies being entitled to any praise. While driving his racing car along the beach at Redondo in search of a location for surf scenes he witnessed the capsizing of a small boat and the struggles of two boys who had been sailing on the rough water. One started to swim for shore while the other was apparently helpless. Although clothed in heavy trousers and jersey, Sennett swam out to the drowning boy, reaching him just as he was sinking. Followed the tedious swim ashore, resuscitation, home-taking and three cheers for Mack.

Raymond B. West is now chaperone for a bevy of beatingly beautiful maids who are working in a picture featuring Bessie Barriscale. Some college scenes are done in one of the big schools near Los Angeles and West has full permission to use any and all parts of the building that he chooses.

Lois Weber ond Phillips Smalley gave a delightful tea the other day at a fashionable hotel in honor of Mrs. Carl Laemmle. Among those present were P. A. Powers, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert Standing, Winnifred Kingston, Myrtle Stedman, Mrs. Bosworth, and a host of others including Richard Willis.

Robert Daly, who recently came with the Universal with his leading lady, Fritzi Brunette, is busy as always and full of lots of good ideas for his pictures. He has a new character comedian, Lew Carter, who came across from the L. K. O. company. Carter is just out of the hospital, having been in two months recovering from an accident which he was in during the winter. He suffered torn ligaments which kept him in all that time.

Two young badgers were caught by the Gene Gauntier-Jack Clark company of Big U players which returned from the vicinity of the Malibu River this week. They filmed scenes for "The Smuggler's Lass" and another picture. The two funny animals have been made pets already, and will be seen in a picture.

From banker to butler is the true case of Col. Fay Butler who has joined the Biograph company as character man after many years of commercial life following his desertion of the stage. He was at one time a New York actor and had not been in makeup for over twenty-eight years. He has been in business in the west for several years, being connected with newspapers, banks, theaters and other lines. He is playing characters now, and is determined to stay in films.

Much excitement prevails this week at Inceville when the whole city turned out on the beach to watch the destruction, by fire, of a specially built bungalow for a scene in "The Beckoning Flame," the five-part feature of life in India, which stars Henry Woodruff and Rhea Mitchell, with Miss Tsura Aoki, the Japanese actress. Charles Swickard is producing the film. The house was not just a skeleton, either, two rooms were built, with windows and verendah, and the sea formed the background through the windows.

Santa Barbara has a word to say. In a short letter Wallace MacDonald, of the Winged Initial company, says: "It is rumored that each company is to be sent to San Francisco to take a picture, so as to allow every actor to see the Fair and still continue production. Hope so, anyway.

Olga Printzlau Clark, the photoplaywright says in another letter, "I suppose you heard of the great leap that Al Thompson made turned out O. K. with no injury to him." This was for the auto wreck scene in the new serial, "The Diamond from the Sky," Thompson doubled for Cummins and went over the cliff with the car, diving sideways into the water far below. In the third chapter you will thrill at this bit of acting and daring. She also says, "I have just closed a deal with the Victor Universal for a 12-reel serial for Mary Fuller, who will appear in twelve entirely different roles in this series."

Hal Clements, doing character and heavy work for the American, has invested in a puncture gun, a new name for an automobile, and now he will go puncture hunting on the boulevards.

Besides Director Jaccard of the Diamond series company, there are now at work in the Flying A plant Harry Pollard, Thomas Ricketts, Henry Otto, Archie McMackin, and Frank Cooley. Business is good indeed, and the seventh chapter of the Diamond mystery story is being filmed this week.

Chick Morrison and his boys were busy at the Sunday benefit show at the racetrack for the Santa Barbara Driving Club. The boys did a lot of hazardous stunts and the show was a regular wild west affair. The film people helped the driving organization and the city, and they certainly were royally treated in return by every person in the mountain city.

CLARK IRVINE.

Richard C. Travers

RICHARD C. TRAVERS, leading man with Essanay, and one of the best all-round athletes of filmdom, has just formed a baseball team of Essanay actors. Mr. Travers, who is captain of the team, is now at work getting the men into training for late spring and summer play. A diamond now is being made. Travers says he has some of the best players in the country and plans to challenge all teams in Chicago, as well as teams in other cities.

Richard C. Travers.

More than six feet tall, and weighing over 200 pounds, Mr. Travers is easily the most powerful man in the Essanay company. Born 650 miles north of Winnipeg, Can., he was using snow shoes and skis when hardly more than a baby.

Travers is an expert skater and hockey player, having played on the Guelph National, Wanderers, St. Andrews, the New York Hockey Club and the Du Quesne Garden teams. He is also an expert polo player and automobile racer, and was an entrant in the well remembered Vanderbilt cup race of 1906.

Scarcely is there a sport in which Mr. Travers is not proficient. In fact, he spends all his time, both winter and summer, outside of his working hours, at some form of athletics. Sports have been his passion ever since he was a boy. In Cornell University he played on the varsity football team, won a "C" in track work and stood as one of the best tennis players in the school.

Also he is some sailor and sailed on the "American" of the Royal Canadian Yacht Club in the Great Lakes Yacht Association race between United States and Canada.

SPOKANE GETS ANOTHER BIG THEATER.

Spokane, Wash., is to have a third new modern exclusive motion picture theater, which is to be erected at the northeast corner of Post street and First avenue, by F. E. Starkey, local mining man, and to represent, including the cost of the site, an investment of $100,000. Mr Starkey purchased the property six years ago for $75,000, and two years ago turned down a cash offer of $125,000. It is known as the Iler Grand block, a two-story brick, 75 feet on First avenue and 47 feet on Post street. The tenants have been advised to vacate the premises so that work on the theater may be begun. Plans are now being prepared for the theater. The entire interior will be torn out and a complete new front installed on Post street, which will be the main entrance. The other walls will be left. A complete theater interior will be constructed and a new roof built. The structure will have a seating capacity of 650. The walls are of strong enough construction to permit the building of the theater. The new theater will be in the center of the hotel district.

NEWHALL TO MANAGE STRAND.

Allen B. Newhall, who has been associated with the Moe Mark Amusement Enterprises since April 1, 1907, and who has successfully managed the Comique Theater, Lynn, Mass., one of the prominent Mark picture houses in that section of the country since 1909, has been appointed by Mr. Mark as managing director of the Strand Theater which is now in the course of erection in Lynn. Mr. Newhall has decided to make a six weeks' tour of the cities in which the company has houses and will pay strict attention to the methods of conducting each theater. Mr. Newhall will increase his knowledge of theater management considerably in this way, and it is planned to spend a week at each house. The trip will be made in the company of Moe Mark. Mr. Newhall is a member of a number of prominent lodges and orders and is also a member of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League.

NEW THEATER FOR RALEIGH, N. C.

R. G. Allen, of Louisburg, N. C., will open a picture theater in Raleigh, N. C. The location selected for the new house is in the most central part of Raleigh, and is an ideal location for a first class moving picture theater. The seating capacity will be 650, and it is estimated that $50,000 will be expended in erecting the structure. The theater will embody all the latest improvements.

News and Views of Photoplay Houses Everywhere

FOREST THEATER, DETROIT, MICH.

Dancing Academy Converted Into Fine Picture House—Program Mailed to 2,000 of Its Patrons Weekly.

THE Forest theater, on Woodward avenue near Forest avenue, Detroit, Mich., architecturally, is a good example of what can be done when one is called upon "to make a virtue of necessity." In this theater, its architect was required to remodel a dancing academy having no basement and no great height from floor to roof into a first-class theater, without disturbing either roof or foundation walls of the building. To gain the greatest possible height from floor to ceiling of the theater the center portion of the building was excavated to form a proper incline for the auditorium floor. This left the sides at substantially their original levels, and gave room for a line of boxes extending from proscenium wall to the rear of the auditorium, thus making it needless to disturb the foundations of the side walls, which extend only a few feet below the original floor level. As a means of increasing the ceiling height, an old ceiling on the level of the bottom of the roof trusses was removed, and a new ceiling put in near the line of the top of the roof trusses, with large coves and cornices concealing the trusses. To apparently increase the actual height gained in this way, a line of concealed electric lamps extending around the top of the ceiling cornice lights the cove and entire ceiling in such a manner as to produce a delicately tinted sky effect of indefinite distance above the eye of a spectator.

Rex W. Minkley.

The theater has a seating capacity of 584 and a stage with a depth of twenty feet. Everything from front to rear of the building is of the best—consistent with the fact that the theater, located in the heart of one of the best residential sections of Detroit, secures its patronage from those who appreciate the best. At present photoplays exclusively are being shown at the Forest theater.

The manager of the Forest theater is Rex W. Minkley, whose excellent likeness is herewith produced. He has been in charge since Jan. 15, 1914. Previous to his connection with this house, the Forest had been known as a "dead one." When Minkley took hold, he immediately started to do things. He studied the wants of the people of that particular neighborhood and before long he had them "coming in bunches." Sometime ago an organ was installed, having Cathedral chimes, full set of organ pipes, clarinet and saxaphone attachment. This replaces the orchestra. Matinees are given daily and two shows at night, prices being ten cents in the afternoon and 10, 15 and 20 cents at night. Five days in the week Universal service is used, Tuesdays and Thursdays being for selected feature programs. The Forest is a well ventilated theater; every dome in the ceiling is connected with a six-foot exhaust fan.

Every week a program for the ensuing seven days is mailed out to residents in the neighborhood, and with each program goes a typewritten letter, calling attention to some particular feature for that week. Patrons are urged to make their wants known to the management and they are assured that everything will be done for their accommodation. From 1,500 to 2,000 programs and letters are mailed weekly.

The Forest belongs to the chain of theaters operated in Detroit and suburbs by George W. Wicks, general manager of the Detroit Universal Film Company.

Rex Minkley not only handles the Forest, but also looks after the new Virginia Park theater which recently opened at Hamilton Boulevard and Virginia avenue, Detroit. He is well known in Michigan both as an actor and as a manager of various theaters in Chicago, Lansing and Battle Creek.

THE AVENUE THEATER, BELLEVUE, PA.

The Avenue theater, 529 Lincoln avenue, Bellevue, Pa., which, prior to the enlargement of the structure by an addition of fifty feet to the rear, had a seating capacity of one hundred thirty-five. The New Avenue, as shown by the accompanying interior picture, was formally opened Saturday, December 12, 1914.

The remodeled house has a seating capacity of three hundred, with standing room for one hundred, and is one of the most up-to-date theaters in this section of Pennsylvania.

Excellent music is furnished by a Seeburg Automatic Piano, installed by the Seltzer Piano Company, Pittsburgh, Pa.

The theater is doing good business. Mrs. B. C. Harris is the owner, and O. M. Hezlep is manager. Record business marked the opening of the rejuvenated Avenue when the Universal feature picture entitled "Neptune's Daughter," starring Annette Kellerman, was shown. The program is made up of Mutual, Box Office Attractions, Famous Players and Continental Film Company pictures.

SHEA'S HIPPODROME—BIG PICTURE HOUSE.

Half Million Dollar Theater Is an Edifice of Beautiful Decoration and Architecture—Escalator Among Improvements.

SHEA'S HIPPODROME, Buffalo's new half million dollar moving picture theater, has been doing a big business since it opened. Crowds have been a feature. The house was built by Michael Shea, a pioneer in vaudeville. The house is fireproof and seats 3,000 persons.

The entrance is on Main street through a lobby 110 feet long, beautifully decorated in old ivory and gold, with 700 electric lights hidden in the beamed ceiling and each beam supported at the sides by a massive figure. The floor is of mosaic tile. There is a wainscot of English veined marble six feet high. The theater is richly carpeted with deep red velvet. The foyer leads across the entire width of the auditorium, which has many beautiful effects. Soft tones and the indirect lighting of the dome and side decorations tend to bring the immense space into a cozy and refined place.

Instead of the high ceiling under the balcony on the orchestra floor, so familiar to Buffalo theatergoers, the ceiling of Shea's Hippodrome has been lowered and the space between has been converted into a commodious mezzanine, reached by two marble stairways, both nine feet wide, situated at both sides of the auditorium.

There is only a comparatively slight rise to this mezzanine and from it the patrons enter the balcony on a level, thus eliminating the long climb to the balcony. The main ceiling of the auditorium and the ceiling of the orchestra under the mezzanine are beautifully paneled, and beamed, and the private boxes and proscenium arch are as elaborate and artistic as modern ideas can make them. The dome in the main ceiling is illuminated by indirect lighting and adds greatly to the effect of the auditorium; it is beautifully decorated with a painting in soft tints called "The Dance of the Hours." Fine paintings are seen at the right and left of the proscenium arch symbolizing the useful and beautiful in art.

In the orchestra pit is placed a $25,000 orchestral organ, as well as a well-balanced orchestra. The organ also fills the space over the private boxes on each side of the house, the bronze gold of the organ pipes adding dignity to the detail of the entire interior of the auditorium.

The balcony is built on the cantilever principle, which makes possible the construction of a theater of great proportions without the use of obstructive columns on the first floor. An innovation in theater construction in Buffalo is found in the private boxes of the mezzanine which may be reached directly from the balcony or by easy ascent from the marble stairways at both sides of the lobby. Another innovation in Buffalo is the escalator, or moving stairway, located at the right of the lobby near the Main street entrance. This means of reaching the balcony may be used by those who do not care to walk up the stairs.

A promenade is found in the rear of the balcony. All windows are of richly colored art glass and are heavily leaded. The absence of wood in the construction of the Hippodrome is noticeable. Exhibitions run from noon until 11 p. m. The admission prices are 10, 15 and 25 cents. Miss Philomena Cavanaugh is in charge of the publicity department of Shea's Hippodrome, and some splendid and compelling advertisements and stories do emanate from her pen.

FAIRY THEATER, KNOX, IND.

Metzger Remodels One of His Houses—Now Compares Favorably with Structures in Big Cities.

TO the list of pretty motion picture houses in places where the population is but a thousand or a little more or less may be added with propriety the name of the Fairy Theater of Knox, Ind. Albert Metzger, the manager and owner, has another photoplay house in Knox named the Royal which is a smaller one than the Fairy. The inhabitants of Knox number 2,500, yet it has two picture places, two newspapers, five churches, two banks, a modern stone court house and a number of other institutions..

To come back to the topic of this story, the Fairy Theater originally had a seating capacity of 200, but since it was subjected to complete transformation the seating accommodation has been increased by 160. The name of the house has been artistically worked in the floor of the lobby. The doors leading to the auditorium are made of strong wood with squares of different colored glass. The box office is between the two entrance doors and is made of the same kind and color of wood as are the doors. Hanging from the center of the ceiling of the lobby is a plain but pretty electrolier.

The dimensions of the Fairy are 22 by 120 feet. It has a balcony seating 56 persons, with two boxes built directly in front of the balcony. There is a stage 21 by 21 feet in size, and the auditorium ceiling is 19 feet high. The interior decorations are grey and buff for the walls and the ceiling is done in ivory trimmed in gold. The size of the operating room, which it is needless to say is built of fireproof material, is 9 by 12 by 9 feet high. Big exhaust fans keep the air in the house always fresh. A Power's 6A motor-driven machine is used, and the throw is 85 feet. Among the other up-to-date equipment in the theater is a General Electric motor generator. The size of the picture is 10½ by 14 feet. Mr. Metzger is showing three reels of licensed pictures for an admission price of 10 cents.

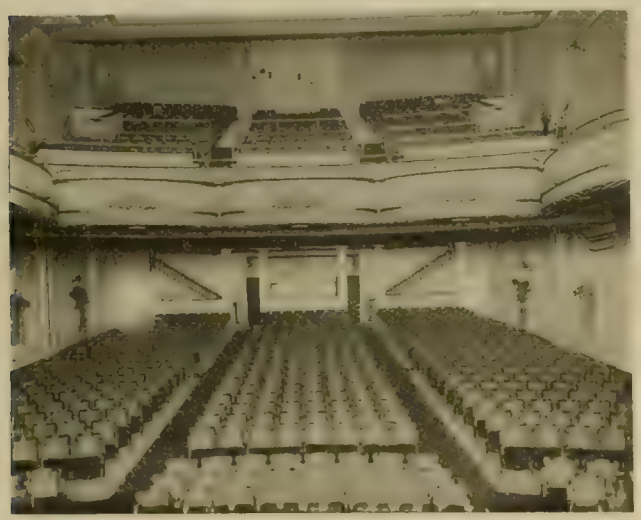
LIBERTY THEATER, SPOKANE, WASH.

New Structure Represents an Investment of $135,000.—Music Furnished by a $15,000 Wurlitzer-Hope-Jones Unit Orchestra.

WHEN the new Liberty Theater, 714½ Riverside avenue, an exclusive motion picture house, was opened to the Spokane public Monday, January 25, hundreds of people were waiting to enter and 3,000 persons witnessed the presentation of "Officer 666," a five-part George Kleine feature, before closing time. This new amusement house cost $135,000, and a $15,000 Wurlitzer-Hope-Jones unit orchestra furnishes the music. Earl L. Thurstensen of New York City is temporary organist and there is singing by a male trio. The foyer stage and box office were embowered with flowers on the opening night, all the gifts of other theatres of the city. Carnations were also presented to all patrons on the opening night.

William Cutts of the Montana Amusement Company, is manager of the new theater and superintendended all construction work. The officers of the Liberty Amusement Company are L. W. Hutton, president; William Cutts, secretary and manager; G. M. Crawford, treasurer. Others interested are Frank T. Bailey of Butte, Montana, and George H. Grombacher of Portland, Oregon.

The theater seats 1,000 and both the parquet and the balcony are provided with the latest type of double opera seats, commodious divans, upholstered in leather, with the rows far enough apart that a comfortable disposition of feet and limbs is possible. The interior is beautifully decorated and the soft cream and gold colorings of the walls and ceiling blend nicely with the delicately shaded electric lighting scheme, which diffuses a mellow glow through the frosted globes, artistically clustered in the main auditorium and scattered in convenient units above the loges.



Interior of Liberty Theater, Spokane, Wash.

The facade is carried out in terra cotta trimmings with an elaborate main entrance, and marquise is built into and made a part of it. The veil surfaces of the exterior are outlined by electric lights set into the terra cotta trim around the openings. The lobby, including the ticket booth, is finished in Mexican onyx and marble. The ceiling is tinted old ivory and gold, and the floor is of imported tile. The vestibule and foyer are finished in French caen stone and sienna marble. The vestibule has a dome ceiling of ornamental plaster artistically decorated in cream and gold, and the side walls are set with beveled plate glass mirrors.

The foyer is splendidly arranged and attractively furnished, and a massive concrete stairway leads up on each side to the balcony. Brass hand rails guard the inclines and stretch around the front of the boxes. To the left of the foyer is the women's retiring room and a matron and a corps of maids are in charge. The entire structure is of steel and concrete, absolutely fireproof, and every appliance for the comfort and convenience of patrons has been provided. The grand foyer is richly carpeted and extends across the front end of the building. It is brilliantly illuminated with electric lights incased in chandeliers, a part of the left side being used as a baby carriage room. The acoustic properties of the theater are declared to be perfect. The lighting is by the cove system, which avoids glare and adds detail to the screen productions.

The unit orchestra, which is supplemented by a trapdrum equipment, is designed essentially for moving picture houses and, in addition to producing real melody, is equipped with a number of appliances for the reproduction of every conceivable sound that will be required to assist in a realistic presentation of the pictures. This instrument is electrically controlled and electric pneumatic swell shades, operated by the feet, swell or diminish the volume of the sound at the pleasure of the organist, while the airs and solos are played on the three keyboards with the hands. The theater building has a ground area of 7,851 square feet with a frontage of 55 feet and extends back 145 feet to the alley. It contains 432,000 feet of space, including second and third story offices, which are at the front overlooking Riverside avenue. The entrance on Riverside avenue is 19 feet wide and the main door space 15 feet wide. There are two balcony entrances in addition to the main entrance, and two seven-foot incline exits lead from the balcony and main auditorium to the alley.

WHITE STAR THEATRE, TILLSONBURG, CANADA.

Manager Egener's Operators Like "Projection Department" —Each Has Copy of "Motion Picture Handbook."

SIXTEEN miles from Ingersoll is the town of Tillsonburg with a population of 3,000. It is another town that can boast of a well managed moving picture theater. Frederic Tristram Egener is the man who is responsible for this amusement emporium. It is known as the White Star theater, and has accommodations for 400. Brick and cement are a part of the fireproof material used in erecting the White Star. There is a small balcony containing fifty seats which are reserved for women. In the back of this little balcony has been placed the operating room which is 8 by 8 feet in size. It is fitted with large port holes and a big vent flue. A Power's 6A projector is used and the throw is 60 feet. The projection is very good; the height of the picture on the screen is 19 feet. All the lights in the house are controlled from an enclosed switchboard in the operating room, and all wiring has been done in conduits. The power is generated by a 2.5 K. W., 60 volt, 41.7 ampere dynamo driven by a 6 horsepower motor, 550 volts at 1,800 revolutions per minute (Fairbanks Morse). Mr. Egener says that he has had no trouble with the power producing plant and it was bought eighteen months ago. The theater is also equipped with a switch which throws on the town power in the event anything should happen with its own generating plant.

Mr. Egener, in a letter to the Moving Picture World, says that he admires the work of F. H. Richardson in trying to always better projection. Each one of the operators of the White Star has a copy of Mr. Richardson's work entitled,

Interior of White Star Theater, Tillsonburg, Ont., Canada.

"The Motion Picture Handbook," and all read the "Projection Department" regularly. Mr. Egener says that he has studied the science of operating so that he can run a machine in case of emergency. He holds an operator's license, and contends that a manager of a picture house should be conversant with operating.

"Your 'Projection Department' is worth the price of subscription alone, not to mention the other valuable departments and articles. I enclose a photo and data on the White Star and should like you to publish them, if you have space, and let our friends and associates in the States see what our small town shows are like in Canada," says Mr. Egener.

Advertising for Exhibitors

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

Mr. Ruffner Heyed.

RECENTLY we ran a paragraph headed "Hey, Ralph Ruffner!" asking for a half page advertisement that George Editor Carpenter had praised. Just as soon as he saw it, Mr. Ruffner "hey-ed" and sent in a copy of the advertisement with the remark that he would have done so before had he not supposed that the Wise Men of the East had enough to write about. Not so. The Wise Men of the East and the Hustlers of the West want to keep together and we should have been sorry to have missed this advertisement. Mr. Ruffner, it will be remembered, runs the American Theater, Butte, Montana. Instead of feeling that the pictures are merely five cent junk and running his house as they do in Denver, he seems to think that some pictures may be worth more than a nickel or a dime. Many exhibitors may be startled at this suggestion, but why?

IS THERE ANY REASON WHY A PICTURE THAT COSTS YOU MORE THAN ANOTHER SHOULD BE SOLD FOR THE SAME PRICE AS THE CHEAPER ARTICLE?

If there is any such reason we should like to hear it. About the only reason we have ever heard advanced is that the public will not pay more. An exhibitor who argues like that should set fire to his house and sit in the orchestra pit until the firemen and the coroner dig him out. There used to be a time when you could see a drama, a farce and some specialties at the theater for prices that ran as high as six bits. This is the day of the two dollar attraction, or was until the pictures came along. The public was educated to a dollar, a dollar and a half and finally the two dollar charge and as much more as the speculators could get for the great stars of the stage. The man who runs a cheap stock company does not ask two dollars, but the man with three times the running expense does. And yet exhibitors whine that the picture theater will always be a five or ten cent proposition and they know they cannot get more. There has been reference made before to a little house in a Carolina town of 500 inhabitants where the Paramount program is shown for twenty-five cents, and yet many western men declare they can make no profit. Selma, Alabama, was a bad town for features, but the Academy of Music kept at it and won out.

If you can write English you can tell your patrons why they should pay more for features if they get more for the money. It costs about five dollars to see good opera. You never hear that called the "singies." It costs a nickel to see the "movies" but it costs a quarter to see picture plays. If it does not cost a quarter, it should, BECAUSE THEY ARE WORTH THAT MUCH TO THE THEATER-GOING PUBLIC.

But instead of saying you cannot do it, you must do as Mr. Ruffner does and DO IT. Educate the people to understand that it is no longer a business with but a single standard of entertainment and that now the more they pay the more they'll get for their money.

This Ruffner advertisement is a half page. In one corner is page 780 of this paper dated February 6, of this year. In the right hand corner is a Paramount advertisement from the Saturday Evening Post with a picture of the American among other theaters shown. In between is this copy:

WHAT WOULD YOU DO?
PARAMOUNT PICTURES CORPORATION
110 W. 40th Street.
New York, Jan. 24, 1915.

To Our Exhibitors:—

Owing to the enormous salary which it has been necessary to pay Mary Pickford in order to secure her services, the Famous Players Film company has found it necessary to first release pictures in which she appears through big city theaters at a minimum admission price of 25 cents up to 50 cents.

(Signed) Paramount Pictures Corporation,
(By) Wm. W. Hodkinson, President.

The above letter was addressed to THE AMERICAN and all other first-class theaters in the United States using the Paramount service.

In the upper left-hand corner of this space we have reproduced a page ad from the February 6th issue of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD (largest of the weekly trade papers) carrying Daniel Frohman's announcement of the stupendous photo-spectacle, "THE ETERNAL CITY," by Hall Caine, in which Pauline Frederick stars. The ultimatum is laid down in the circled lines which says, "THIS SUBJECT WILL AFFORD UNUSUAL OPPORTUNITIES TO THOSE THEATERS CHARGING 25 CENTS OR MORE ADMISSION."

IT IS THE HANDWRITING ON THE WALL!

THE AMERICAN THEATER is one of the most prominent institutions in our city. Our records show that EIGHT HUNDRED THOUSAND men, women and children patronize it every year. This tremendous total is EQUAL to TWENTY TIMES THE POPULATION OF BUTTE. Our reputation as a progressive and model theater is becoming nation wide, as attested by the reproduction of a page ad in the February 6th issue of the Saturday Evening Post.

The American is a picture house exclusively; it offers no vaudeville; it plays no road attractions; every first-class photo production rightfully belongs to it. By reason of the difference of TEN CENTS in admission prices on some of the largest photo-plays to come, is it right and just that the AMERICAN, an exclusive picture house, as above stated, should step aside and see these magnificent photo productions housed in theaters WILLING to charge 25 cents, but who are not as well equipped to handle a BIG picture as we think we are?

Mr. Ruffner shows that he must charge twenty-five cents if he would run Paramounts. If he does not get them some regular house will, and probably butcher them. He runs them, runs them right and makes them worth a quarter. There is not a town of two thousand or over in this country that is not now ready to be educated to a feature price for feature pictures, not every day, perhaps, in the smaller towns, but one or two days a week. The popularity of the pictures will ever be based on their cheapness in proportion to their excellence, and there will always be five and ten cent houses with programs to match, but to argue that we must never charge more than the original price of five cents is as foolish as it would be to argue that we should not have automobiles and aeroplanes because the ox cart used to be good enough. It is too bad we cannot reproduce the Ruffner advertisement, but it is done on green paper and the engraver doesn't like us any too much anyhow. But the gist of the argument is given here, to help you along. You can do what Mr. Ruffner and others have done. Why not start in? Now is as good a time as any. You'll probably be surprised to find that the quarter price will be effective in bringing in a quarter crowd, a better class of patrons, in addition to those you already have.

Spring Valley Again.

C. H. Lynch, of the Palace theater, Spring Valley, Ill., writes, enclosing his first weekly issue. He says:

> Here is the first number of Palace News. I know it's awful, but this is my very first attempt at getting out a sheet, so I don't care how hard you hammer it. Tell me just what you think of it and don't be afraid, as I value your opinions very highly and will appreciate criticism.
> On account of this being our first and not knowing just how much to write for the sheet, I had to fill up with two of our own house ads, as you will note on the inside of the sheet. Hereafter it will contain no ads on inside, just straight matter. Which is best?
> How do you like the paper stock used? I had it printed on very heavy stock, also as you will note per sample slice enclosed.
> I do not like heavy stock, as it is too hard to fold and insert in envelope. I mail every single number; none distributed. Several ladies have commented on it very favorably. I believe it will pay us.
> Back page ads just about cover postage on each issue. We are trying to run a 10c show against two or three reel for a nickel shows as competitors.

This is a four page issue, six by nine on a light, but tough, paper, slightly surfaced. The ink offsets a trifle, evidently being a little too thin, but the impression is good and black. As Mr. Lynch seems to know, the advertisements on the inside page give the small issue the suggestion of incompleteness. Since it had to be done, it would have been better to have moved the small item on the second column of page three over to the bottom of page two, to have written a smaller advertisement for the bottom of that page, pulling the present advertisement there over to page three and dividing the last column between the two present ads, pulling in the space given the present third page ad to let the other in. This would have given a better balanced make-up than a half column ad on one page and a two-thirds column on the other. In any case advertisements following reading matter in the same column should be cut off with a double line full width rule instead of a dash.

From the general nature of the text we imagine that Mr. Lynch does not know his full program in time to print it. If he does, this should be run on the third page, top of the outside column, boxed with two point rule. Where the full bill is known, it should invariably be given in program form. The recommendation to put it on the third page is made because the first page is occupied by a house announcement. The house talk, if continued, is of greater importance than the program, particularly in such a case as Mr. Lynch's, where he is giving the high-priced show and needs to explain why his show costs more because it is worth more. The first text is merely salutatory. Succeeding issues should contain a series of well written arguments along these lines. Much good stuff can be found in back issues of this department. Nothing is more valuable to a manager than this personal talk with the patrons if it is written in the proper conversational, intimate style. Do not get over familiar, but be friendly. This first issue sets a standard. The greeting is written with a sincerity that means much more than it says. A thirty-six point initial letter and a larger type for the heading will be helpful in giving the page its due appearance of importance. Heading in this case means the heading of the article and not the heading of the paper. Here the dropping of "the" in "The Palace News" will permit a better face to be used. This is one exception to the general rule that upper and lower case is better than all capitals. The heading of a paper may be set in all capitals.

Some of the text could be improved a little by being more explicit. One announcement reads:

> Coming Soon—Broadway Star Features—Direct From Broadway.

It would be much better to tell just what part of Broadway. Say—

> Coming soon! Broadway Star Features. Direct from their metropolitan run at the Vitagraph theater, Broadway and 44th street, New York City.

Another item says:

> Every Tuesday night at the Palace is "Hazards of Helen" night. Ladies are especially invited to attend the Tuesday matinees.

Of course it is understood that the bill is the same in the afternoon, but why not use this?

> Every Tuesday is "Hazards of Helen" day at the Palace. The ladies are especially invited to attend the matinees on Tuesdays.

That says just what the other means, but it reads a trifle more smoothly, and many who do not know why a sentence sounds crudely will know that it does. But this is a suggestion rather than criticism, for fluency will come with practise. On the back page the advertising should be divided by heavier rule, a full two point would be best.

If the heading is to be broken up, it would be best to run it like this:

PALACE NEWS.

Vol. 1. Spring Valley, March 27, 1915. No. 1.

The lower of the rules should be a double line. The double rule is used to mark a definite division between two forms. It is the period in rule work where the shorter dash is the comma and the long dash the colon:

Another Post Card.

The Third Street theater, Easton, Pa., enclosed with a recent program one of the Paramount cards for "It's No Laughing Matter," in which the use of a sketched design attracts and holds the attention, carrying the reader down to the advertising matter. In passing it is well to note that if the attractor is placed above the advertising it is apt to have a better effect than when placed below.

No Children.

D. B. Baker, of the Rex theater, Ottumwa, Iowa, sends in an advertisement for "A Fool There Was," and asks an opinion. Two of the paragraphs from the very well worded copy read:

CENSORED.

> We only booked this attraction after careful investigation. It has been shown in the leading theaters at big prices, being first presented at The Strand, New York's finest theater. It has been wonderfully received by the press and critics, country-wide—it has passed all censorship boards without a clip. The wonderful and artistic handling of the subject drives home a powerful moral.

CHILDREN NOT ADMITTED.

> Although children are being admitted in other cities, on this attraction we have decided to say "No" to children under sixteen.

This may have been intended to lead the older patrons to expect a performance that children should not see. It certainly will give that impression, and we are inclined to think that those who go in the expectation of seeing something risque will be disappointed and resentful. "A Fool There Was" is not precisely the type of play to be recommended to children, but the attitude of the house is a good one in that respect, but the phrasing of the second paragraph seems to seek to nullify the effect of the first. It is merely a matter of morals and not what is shown on the screen that might hurt the infant mind. Care should have been taken to explain this to avoid the suggestion that there were actual scenes that should not be shown to the youngsters. It would have been better to have phrased the last paragraph more like this:

CHILDREN NOT ADMITTED.

> Not because there is anything objectionable in the picture itself. For that matter, there has been no restriction whatever placed on the showing of this picture in most houses. But the theme is not one that should be placed before the child mind. for that reason alone the prohibition is made. No children under sixteen can be admitted.

The objection to this indefinite form of advertising is that the man or woman who would appreciate the production as such will feel cheated if led to expect ultra sensational scenes and in the reaction will not appreciate the real merit. A man who might welcome a glass of cold water would be resentful if the invitation to "have a drink" led him to expect a highball. Water as water would be appreciated, but water where whiskey was anticipated would be a disappointment. It is the same idea with this.

P. C. O.

That stands for "please call often," and is intended for Dave Udell, of the Majestic, Paxton, Ill. Mr. Udell writes:

> For many years I have been a constant reader of The Moving Picture World and take special interest in The Exhibitors' advertising department. I have profited wonderfully by the splendid hints set forth therein.
> Inclosed you will find one of the many ads I write for moving pictures each day. I do not believe in writing along the old beaten path, just announcing this and that. But believe firmly in changing my style each day, forcing the public to read what I have to offer. If you see anything good in the ad mentioned herein I wish you would please comment on it.

Here's a natural-born advertisement writer who has been interested in the department for a long time and yet who just comes in. And he modestly says "if" we see anything good in the advertisement. Huh! "If!" Use your own judgment. Here it is, as well as short form will give it. The original will not reduce down well:

> dear mary:—
> Its bin a long spell sence i wus in dear old Golossyam county sitten on th' old horse hair sofie with you, en b'lieve me i surtainly mis you; but b4 i kin go back i wil heve t' take en this new seeral story at th' CrystaL Theatur, gee, i wish you wus hear t' see ut. it starts
> tonight
> en i kin almose wate en thats all. y'know how tis dontcha Mary. Anyhow hears 2 picturs inclothes, one of Herbert Rawlinson an tother of Anna Little.
> "Big V" cuts of the players mentioned are inserted here.
> ther the ones i got t' see tonite in
> "The Black Box"
> Huh! i bet their aint nuthin in th' box; its all a mystery, still i dunno; then thet aint all Mary, thet aint all; they got more 2.
> It Might Have Been Worse
> is a comeday there to heve; i bet its funny 2.
> The Clue of the Portrait
> is the tuther one there goin to show; en thets all Mary; thets enuf to. all i keer t' see for one dime.
> Well good by Mary, i'll be home when "THE BLACK BOX" is all over. good by, From yer dear frien'
> JOHN.

If you are not running "The Black Box" you can adapt this to other releases. Now that Mr. Udell has taken his light from under the bushel, we hope he keeps on burning brightly. Any man who can write stuff like that and make frequent changes is too useful to the rest of us to flock all by himself.

There Are Some.

There are some advertisers in Brooklyn besides Mr. Wunderle. Ben Weisberg, of the Ralph theater, sends in two samples for comment and asks for samples from other exhibitors. His address is the Ralph, Ralph avenue, near Chauncey street, Brooklyn. One of these is printed on a bilious green stock that looks as cheerful as a corpse and is badly printed besides. Types are clogged up and the ink smudges. The best advertising line is one run by a shoemaker, "Hand work for your feet." Too much type for the space gives the bill an overcrowded appearance. No one can get much interested in a bill that looks as though it needed a tiny bow of crepe to be complete. Evidently Mr. Weisberger realized this himself, for he changed the issue to white stock and a larger sheet where he can say more and still have elbow room. There is not much elbow room at that, for the printer scorned smaller than ten point and used that, apparently, only when he ran out of twelve point. The shoemaker comes in again with "You save money. I save your heel and sole." If we were in that neighborhood we would have a talk with that man and get some pointers for the house stuff, provided he originated the catchlines.

About two-thirds as much type and some of it in eight point will give a much better looking issue and be a better advertisement, as well, since what is there can be read. We reproduce in miniature the front page of the larger sheet. The type page is 4⅞ by 7½. The top line is in fourteen point where a ten line light italic would have gotten the message over just as well and would not have detracted from the house name as much as it does. The same thing may be said of the High Class Photoplays. This bold 36 point letter takes away from the house title, and is given an undeserved prominence. The admission price should have been dropped to the bottom. The use of a light box throws up the Old Dutch well, but this is the sole evidence of skill on the part of the compositor, though it must be admitted on his behalf that he was hampered by an excess of copy.

The space would work harder if there was used instead a running announcement of the current week's features, set in ten point, but something better than a straight roman face, with titles bold face and names in italic.

We should like to see what Mr. Weisberger does with later issues. Once he realizes the value of white space and not all big type we think he will do something.

THE PHOTOPLAYWRIGHT

INQUIRIES.

Questions concerning photoplay writing addressed to this department will be replied to by mail if a fully addressed and stamped envelope accompanies the letter, which should be addressed to this deparment. Questions should be stated clearly and should be typewritten or written with pen and ink. Under no circumstances will manuscripts or synopses be criticized, whether or not a fee is sent therefor.

A list of companies will be sent if the request is made to the paper direct and not to this department, and a return stamped envelope is enclosed.

Hall's Leaderless Script.

EMMETT CAMPBELL HALL rises to explain the "leaderless" scripts of "The Road o' Strife," which the press department of the Lubin company uniquely explained had no leaders, but merely cut in dialogue. We expressed the polite opinion that a cut in leader was not very different from straight leader, so Mr. Hall is moved to explain. The cut gives the most simple explanation, but Mr. Hall's letter is of interest. He writes:

The item headed "How?" appearing in the issue of April 17, will, I am afraid, create a totally erroneous impression as to the titling scheme used in my "Road o' Strife" serial. The idea will demonstrate itself to those who chance to see the pictures on the screen, but an explanation may be of interest to some of the many who will not.

In the first place, it should be understood that the idea is not offered as a "way to avoid all trouble." On the other hand, its application greatly increases the difficulties of the author, he being unable to resort to impersonal statements of fact as to time, relationship, motives and beliefs, to say nothing of the technical difficulties incident to the elimination of the caption used for the purpose of breaking scenes merely. There are imposed many of the limitations of the speaking stage, without its privileges. It is not for an instant contended that the scheme could be used in connection with photoplays as they are now written—a special technique, combining that of the speaking stage and the photoplay must be developed. Whether or not the idea is worthy of such development remains to be seen.

I think it will be admitted without argument that the greatest defect of the photoplay is the destruction of illusion occasioned by captions, of which the cut-in is the least "intrusive" form. The theoretically perfect photoplay, one without captions of any kind, is, practically, an impossibility, and the best that can be hoped for is a form of title which will soften the inevitable shock of the sudden transition from action to printed words and conserve the illusion which has been created to the greatest possible degree. An action registers its meaning directly on the mind, and a spoken word seems to, long mental habit rendering the translation of the sound-symbol a subconscious process, but with printed words, which must first be mentally translated into equivalent sound-symbols, this degree of proficiency has not been attained—one is conscious that he is reading something that is intended to mean or stands for a certain thought. It may be assumed, as a practical proposition, that the sound-symbol is as undisturbing in its action on the mind as would be the act or object which it represents. Therefore, all desirable ends are attained if a method can be devised whereby necessarily printed words will convey their meaning to the mind without a conscious translation to the sound-symbol form—in other words, in such manner that reading will not be a conscious act. This can, I have tried to demonstrate, be accomplished with a degree of success, by imposing on mental habit and tricking the spectator into using his eyes for his ears. When we see a person speaking, we expect to hear the words, and if word symbols in the form of print are presented at the exact psychological moment, without removing from before the eyes the supposed source of the words, the mental effect should very closely approximate hearing the words spoken, and the thought be conveyed to the mind almost subconsciously.

To carry out the idea fully, every caption must be a line spoken by a character, and this is true of the entire fifteen parts of the "Road o' Strife" serial, with a single exception. The caption "A Week Later" is used once, in the conventional manner, for a particular purpose. According to my experience, a greater number of captions are required to make the story entirely clear if the author restricts himself to actual character dialogue, but I do not find that they average much longer. The showing of the caption without interruption of the picture is, of course, possible only by double exposure. In this serial, every caption has had individual consideration and been brought in and taken out in accordance with its characteristics—some dissolve in and dissolve out, while others appear abruptly and slowly fade, while still others flash on and instantly disappear, as a sharp, explosive "No!" seems to snap off in the air.

I do not wish to be understood as offering this idea as a perfect plan or one to be substituted bodily for the established scheme of subtitling, but I do think that it is along this line that we must endeavor to perfect the photoplay, and earnestly hope that my effort will ultimately prove of some slight value and a step forward in the march of our young art.

We have not yet seen one of the new reels, but we are going to, for Mr. Hall brings to his work artistic ideas as well as plot ability. But until we do see the release we shall wonder whether or not the leader across the scene is not more intrusive than one between parts of the scene.

Two Openings.

Clarence J. Harris, whose name should be familiar to readers of this department, is now editor for the Gaumont company. He writes that he is strong for the open market for scripts and wants to see the work of people who really can write. Others should send synopses only. Two and three reel stories are the ones wanted. They should be addressed to the Gaumont Company, Flushing, N. Y.

While the Reliance-Majestic headquarters are in Los Angeles, with "Spec" Woods in charge, the local studio is making a little one-reel stuff. The one-reel length only is wanted and the stories must be suitable for production at the Yonkers studio. They should be addressed to Reliance Motion Picture Corporation, 71 West 23rd street, New York City. Howard Irving Young is in charge at this end. His rejection does not cover the Los Angeles studio, but he anounces that stuff sent in that he cannot use will be passed along to Spec if found suitable, so if you send in to New York and get the script back from Los Angeles, this is the explanation. It is best to make a price on these scripts, unless you will accept what is offered.

Why?

Comes another one of those baited hooks. This time it is the United Film Plays Company, of New York. They write:

> In our last letter to you we made a very special offer, and enclosed a coupon for your signature, so that you could become a member of our writing force, for two dollars ($2.00). We also told you that it was a limited special offer to enable us to get good stories quickly, and that we would not again make the same offer.

And because the offer was so very special and so exceedingly limited, they give you one more chance to waste two perfectly good dollars; not to mention "four cents in stamps." You cannod send a money order for $2.04, it is presumed. And this is what you get for the spendable two spot:

> First—You will edit and criticise my first scenario, point out any weakness—strengthen it for me—show me how to build it—go over it word by word—and line by line.
> Second—My stories to receive first consideration for purchase and preference over the stories of other persons not on your staff.
> Third—You give me valuable information such as: Showing me how to get clearness of conception—classification of scenarios—the correct form of construction of plots—how to generally strengthen my stories—how to select titles and sub-titles—help me to make my characters real—show me what heart interest means—what comedy means—point out the real humor of situations—tell me just what constitutes a scene—how to begin and end a scene, etc.
> Fourth—You are to send me immediately an absolutely complete scenario, actually ready for the camera, just as produced by one of the foremost photoplay producers.

And if you fall "one editor of our staff" will be appointed to always read your stuff. If the "one editor" finds that you are hopeless and "our chief editor ascertains also your inability to succeed," you get the two back; presumably with the aid of a club.

The entire circular is worded to convey the impression that the company wants to purchase scripts for its own use, but no definite statement to that effect appears. It is all done by inference and they are not legally to blame if you make an incorrect inference.

And still they come. The revision game is getting stronger than the school stunt because it is safer.

Plot Exercise.

Take this copy of the paper and turn to the stories of the films. Make each story over into something different. Never mind putting it down on paper. Do it in your mind. Work every story over to be as different as possible. Do the same thing again next week and the next. At the end of six months you will instinctively turn over each plot, you see, not once but perhaps many times. And some of these evolved ideas will be new enough to write and send out. You don't have to write out every plot you think of and make it into a photoplay before you think of another plot. Take time over your plays and do them right, but devote half an hour every day to plot gymnastics and you'll have a grip on ideas that will get you into such form that you can make plots work for you instead of your working hard for plots.

Without His Whiskers.

"And who are you?" asked the man.

"Hawkshaw the detective," he cried, as with a flourish he tore off his false whiskers.

For a long time we have had a correspondent who has been nameless. Now the excellent reasons for withholding his name have ceased to be and we introduce Herman A. Blackman with very great pleasure. He writes:

> Do you know I believe that your article about labored development could be very easily misunderstood? You certainly cannot mean that unless we can just dash off we are to leave them alone. A lot of us can't do it. There's Chandlee, for instance. He says that he has a head full of ideas that won't come out easily and that he just won't do a story, original or rewrite, until it is ready. That man is a star, but he has to work hard just like I do.
> If I get your idea correctly you mean that one should not twist and maul his story until the melody of it is ruined. The continuity of theme in the melody of a song is of no more importance than the same thing in a story. Extra or unnecessary interpolations in a story break this melody and if one changes and twists and warps around his ideas too long they become broken and disconnected. Likewise, if one changes keys in the story, he should be careful not to go from E flat to C, but rather from E flat to B flat in order that the new key may be related to the old one. A change of keys in a story is a dangerous thing anyhow, and should not be attempted by anyone but a master. It ALWAYS breaks the melody and seldom gives compensation for it. Hard work on a story has to be carefully governed or it will have the effect of breaking it up in just this way, and the tale which starts in C will end up in B.
> I read Mr. Ballard's letter in the April 3 issue. Him and me's pards on that idea of making your character touches be a part of the plot whenever you can. His reference, however, is not to Mr. Merwin's stuff upon characterization but to mine in my letter quoted by you in the Feb. 20 number. This thing of making character touches fit into the plot will certainly give an author "style" that but few can imitate. I have been watching carefully to see if any authors were doing it and in all my observation I have found but one, "Old Dutch," and I do not know the author of that.
> In "Old Dutch" the author shows Dutch as a great lover of the kiddies. Now that always has an appeal in an elderly person and most authors would have been satisfied with that. But this author uses this character touch in at least three different places in his plot. The first place was where he was romping with the kiddies and bumped into THE young man at the fountain. This secured the introduction of his daughter to THE young man. The next instance was when he was so anxious to play with the children, that he hurriedly chucked his precious pocketbook at his pocket, missing it, of course. The last case was where he generously gave the child so much candy for her money that he attracted the attention of the proprietor, who confiscated the precious half-dollar which Old Dutch needed so much. Thus, in these three places the author not only got over a sympathetic touch of character but made it contribute to his plot. With Lew Fields to put it over 't certainly made a great play.

We did not think the article obscure, but if it is then Mr. Blackman has read rightly between the lines. Take the time you need to develop the plot properly, but do not let effort show through in mechanical, ground-out action. Wait until the plot will move smoothly and fluently at the speed to which you are accustomed to work, but until it is ready to go on paper do not try and force it there. Do not writhe and struggle with it, getting a development that is so slow and painstaking and utterly without life that even the children can sense the lack of smoothness, of rhythm, which is a better simile, perhaps than Mr. Blackman's melody, though in using melody he is able to produce another valuable simile in the change of keys, on which an entire story might be written—and probably will be.

One Viewpoint.

Getting the right viewpoint is half the battle, and one western woman seems to have found not only a proper point of view from which to regard her work, but she quotes authorities to justify her position. In spite of the over-flattering comment on this department, we print her letter in full:

> For the past three months it has been my intention to write thanking you for the help and encouragement you have given me in my attempts to be an author; but I have always refrained from doing so thinking I might bore you. In the last "Moving Picture World," the would-be author kicking about you spending so much time trying to discourage young authors, spurred me to action.
> A year ago I bought "Technique of the Photoplay" and thought I would soon make the world sit up and take notice of my ability as an author, but alas and alack! I soon began to think I was not quite so gifted, but I was not a bit discouraged, and each week as the "World" arrived and I had finished reading your department greedily, I became more and more encouraged. If you had said time and again that it was easy to write photoplays instead of the reverse, I should have felt discouraged a long time ago, because I then would have called myself a blockhead. I know what hard work is, both physical and mental, so hard work combined with unlimited patience, average intelligence, a vivid imagination, power to visualize everything I write, a high school education, and a fairly good memory ought to bring me literary success.
> I am studying Neal's "Short Stories in the Making," reviewing my rhetoric, a chapter a day, writing synopsis of plots which I have already visualized (six—from one to three reelers since the first of February), thinking up changes in my twelve photoplays written between March, 1914, and January, 1915, and contemplating getting several books from the Public Library, the study of which will, I hope, enable me to write a very thrilling three-reel play, which I have visualized, but am doubtful about some of the scenes being true to life.
> Being an optimist is probably the reason I have found encouragement in the following extracts from several articles I have read lately, so shall pass them along, as they may be the means also of helping some other struggling author who is not afraid to work, and needs cheering words to save him from being a backslider. Dr. Madison C. Peters in a recent issue of the San Francisco "Examiner" wrote a great deal of truth when he stated "Our country is full of people who can do many things fairly well, but do not know how to do one thing supremely well. . . . He who knows everything is always looking for something. The specialist does not have to look for a job; the job is looking for him. To succeed you must be unanimous with yourself. . . . The successful worker of today is he who singles out from a vast number of possible employments some specialty and to that devotes himself thoroughly. . . . There is a business that is not a business. It is seldom that the most brilliant achieve the highest success. The sticker, like the postage stamp, gets there. Persistency is more effective than brilliancy. . . . The man at the summit was not shot up in an elevator; he climbed there. No matter what you undertake, don't leave it until you can put your arms around it and clinch it with your hands on the other side."
> G. Vere Tyler wrote in a recent issue of the "Examiner" the following apt sentences: "The one supreme joy in life is effort. The only thing that never fails is effort—persisted in. . . . No effort ever persisted in for the length of time proportionate to the aim ever wholly failed. . . . Effort hides its hourly development from the person making it until a given time, when it suddenly shows the accomplished thing and makes the man laugh aloud.'
> Since reading several months ago that it requires time and patience to succeed in any walk of life, I have not sent out a single script. "The Poor Little Rich Girl," is considered a perfect play, but it took Eleanor Gates twelve years of thinking to finish it. She probably wrote innumerable books in the meantime, but her greatest success was not written in a hurry. Edwin Markam's poem, "The Man with the Hoe," was ten years in the making. "Make an effort and be patient" should be the motto of the would-be-photoplaywright.
> There are ever so many things that I should like to write you which I think would be encouraging to the young author, but I forbear, for fear my long drawn out discourse will not meet with your approval.
> If I should be successful in my endeavors within the next two years, I shall write and let you know. Sometimes outside influences in the shape of an illness in the family give one a setback, but barring that, I hope to some day become an author, if from seven to twenty-one hours a week will do the trick. I should like to devote more time to my chosen work, but housework and the care of a dear little daughter make it impossible. I think my new plots and visualize my plays while doing my housework, but days that extra heavy physical work has to be done, I find my brain unresponsive, so I have learned many a time the futility of trying to burn the candle at both ends. Physical Culture is a great stimulus to mental activity and the highest of efficiency, and without it I should never have tried to become an author.

Thanks.

One correspondent, querying on a matter of fiction writing, adds: "My excuse for asking this question of a photoplay department is that I get each week from the same department valuable hints on the writing game in general."

Manufacturers' Notice.

It is an established rule of this department that no apparatus or other goods will be endorsed or recommended editorially until the excellence of such articles has been demonstrated to its editor.

Important Notice.

Owing to the mass of matter awaiting publication it is impossible to reply through the department in less than two to three weeks. In order to give prompt service, those sending four cents, stamps (less than actual cost), will receive carbon copy of the department reply, by mail, without delay. Special replies by mail on matters which cannot be replied to in the department one dollar.

Both the first and second set of questions are now ready and printed in neat booklet form, the second half being seventy-six in number. Either booklet may be had by remitting 25 cents, money or stamps, to the editor, or both for 40 cents. Cannot use Canadian stamps. Every live, progressive operator should get a copy of these questions. You may be surprised at the number you cannot answer without a lot of study.

Question No. 83.

Best answer will be published, and the names of others sending in replies of excellence will appear in the Roll of Honor. Theater managers looking for high-class men will do well to watch the Roll of Honor.

What effect, or effects, has a ground in a rheostat? Suppose your rheostat is in the neutral (Edison three-wire system) and a ground developed at the opposite carbon arm, what would be the effect?

Roll of Honor on Question No. 77.

The Roll of Honor on question 77 consists of: Joseph H. M. Smith, Fort Worth, Tex.; John Solar, Watertown, N. Y.; A. C. Stewart, Pendleton, Ore.; Montreal, Can.; W. C. Crawford, Brooklyn, N. Y.; H. A. Carver, Wheeling, W. Va.; Vernon Kidd, Victoria, B. C., and P. E. Everts, Marshalltown, Ia.

Brother Solar sent in a very complete explanation of the action of a choke coil. The trouble with it is, however, it is so complete that the average operator would be utterly unable to understand it, or even make an intelligent stagger at following the matter through. Solar unquestionably understands the action of a choke coil very well indeed, but, due to the aforesaid reasons, I have selected the reply of W. C. Crawford as best serving our purpose. It is not anywhere near as complete as Solar's reply, but a good many times more understandable.

Reply to Question No. 77.

By W. C. Crawford, Brooklyn, N. Y.

The Question:

What is a "choke" or "reactance" coil? How is it made? Explain its action in detail, setting forth the points for and against it, from the operator's standpoint. Can it be used on D. C.? Where would you locate your projection circuit rheostats? Explain points for and against locating them inside and outside the operating room.

The Answer:

A choke and reactance coil is one and the same thing. It may consist of either one or two laminated iron cores, around which are windings of large insulated copper wire. The laminations of the core will, in practice, be insulated from each other by a thin coating of insulating compound. In some choke coils these windings are made directly on the core itself, the core first being covered with an insulation, in which case different contacts are provided, by means of which a portion of the coil may be cut in or out, in order to vary the amperage at the arc. In other styles the winding is made on a metal spool, inside of which the core is placed, and it is so arranged that the core may be withdrawn a portion of the distance in order to vary the amperage at the arc.

The current passing through this coil, or these coils, sets up a magnetic field, which, due to the effect of the laminated core, is very powerful. In order to generate current a dynamo must cause the conductors on its amature to cut magnetic lines of force. The action of a choke coil is similar to that of a dynamo in reverse. In the case of the choke coil the conductor is stationary, but the lines of magnetism pass through the conductor, and in so doing are cut by the conductor, the effect being that a counter e. m. f. (voltage) is created, which opposes the line voltage and creates what may be termed a magnetic resistance. In a dynamo the voltage generated will depend upon the number of lines of force cut by the conductor in the armature. In a choke coil the amount of opposition set up against the line voltage will depend on the number of lines of magnetic force cut, therefore the voltage, and, of course, the amperage, may be varied by eliminating a portion of the coils by means of different contacts, or by sliding the core in or out. The wires in the coil are thoroughly insulated from the core, and the wire itself is also heavily insulated. A choke coil is connected in series with the arc, the same as is a rheostat. It has no advantage over the transformer. Its efficiency is approximately the same, and the results in screen illumination are unsatisfactory. It operates, however, with very much less loss than the rheostat, also without the rheostat's heat. When a choke coil is used there is bound to be present (a) flaming at the arc; (b) difficulty in concentrating the light in a small enough spot on the carbons to allow proper focusing; (c) ghosts. Since a choke coil depends upon induction for its action it cannot be used on direct current circuits.

Rheostats should preferably be placed outside the operating room, but in an accessible place, where they can be quickly reached in case of trouble. They should always be completely insulated from the ground, the best material for this purpose being sheet asbestos, or asbestos mill-board. The reason for preferring a location outside the operating room is the heat generated is removed from the operating room, which is already too warm in summer. There is no reason for locating a fixed resistance rheostat inside the operating room unless local laws require it, but with an adjustable rheostat it is advisable to have it so placed that the operator may vary his current at will. There is no serious objection to placing the rheostat inside the operating room, provided it be on a properly constructed shelf near the ceiling, with a metal hood and pipe to carry the heat away to the outer air.

Maltese Cross Condensing Lenses.

The manufacturers and importers of the Maltese Cross condensing lenses have satisfied this department that their goods are high class, and possess what the editor believes to be superior qualities, in that the process of manufacture ought to produce a lens superior to that made by pouring melted glass into a mould. The manufacturers of the Maltese Cross condensers describe the process of manufacture as follows:

> First, the optical glass is made and boiled in large pots for a considerable period, to eliminate air bubbles, etc., as far as it can reasonably be done. This molten mass is then poured on a table and steel rolls are run over it, resulting in the product taking the form of large, thick flat sheets. These sheets are then put through an annealing process covering a week or more, the length being dependent upon the brittleness of the glass, which varies. After this is completed the large sheets are cut into small squares. The correct weight for each focal length is determined mathematically. The small pieces of glass are then made to conform with these specific weights. If too heavy, a piece of the glass is chipped off; if too light, a piece is added. These small plates are then put into a melting oven and softened. After the glass has softened sufficiently to permit molding, it is transferred to a mold and a few minutes later you have a rough molded lens. The glass in this form is then again subjected to an annealing and tempering process for several days, after which the lenses are examined, and such that show excessive strata or bubbles are thrown back into the pot to be remelted. Those that show the proper quality are sent to the grinding and polishing room, where they are set in automatic machinery for the various foci, and are ground and polished. After this last process is completed the lenses are again tested for focal length. The molten mass used for the production of Maltese Cross lenses contains optical properties, and, being free from lead, guaranteed against turning black, blue, violet, red, etc. In some instances, where the lenses are subjected to an extreme heat, they will turn a slight straw color. We guarantee our lenses to conform with the above statement. We also guarantee our lenses to be within $^1/_{16}$ inch of the specified focal length.

It will be observed that the manufacturers guarantee their lenses absolutely against any discoloration of any kind whatsoever except a light straw color. These manufacturers have also agreed with this department, in writing, that they will absolutely guarantee every condensing lens put out by them to be the focal length it is stamped within 1/16 of an inch either way, making a total possible variation of 1/8 of an inch, which I am informed is as near as lenses of this character can be made commercially. Another point is that these lenses are worked down to a tolerable thin edge, meaning there is a minimum amount of surplus glass. The manufacturers inform me it is impossible to eliminate all waste glass, that is to say, bring the lenses right down to a sharp edge at 4½ inches diameter. The lenses I have examined have not shown more than 1/16 inch excess glass, whereas some of other makes have shown fully ⅛ inch, which means a very heavy unnecessary loss of light through absorption.

In view of these various facts the Maltese Cross condensers have the commendation of the projection department.

This does not mean there are no other good lenses, but with the exception of the Laemmle Film Service, Minneapolis, meniscus-bi-convex condensers, the Kleine Optical Company, Chicago, and the Maltese Cross manufacturers, no dealer or manufacturer has, up to date, shown this department their condensing lenses are worthy of recommendation.

Where and What's the Matter?

M. E. Lash, Searcy, Arkansas, says:

> I have a 65-foot throw, using D. C. One side of my picture is always out of focus. Have two different lenses, but neither will give a perfect focus. Where and what's the matter? Have a three-reel program, changed every day; features once or twice a week. Five and ten cents for my regular show and 25 cents for features. Why will feature companies rent their pictures and let managers (?) give the public the best pictures made at five and ten cents? The Hippodrome Amusement Company of Dallas, refused to let me have "The Spoilers" unless I charged 25 cents. I am strong for that kind of company every time, and you can bet "The Spoilers" will show here April 1st, God willing. People raise a fearful kick about me charging so much, but in my advertising I tell them I can get features and show them for five and ten cents, but that I believe they all want only the best, and if they are to have the best I cannot do it on a cheap basis. Do you think that kind of talk is good advertising? In this small town I am janitor, bill boy, advertising manager, and in fact the whole blooming cheese, except musician and ticket seller.

Well, if you are getting away with it that is pretty good proof the line of talk is good advertising. As to the out-of-focus proposition, sounds as if your machine set out of center with the screen. If you have the machine set out of center, sidewise, with the screen very much it will be difficult to get a clear focus all over the picture. The answer is: center the machine, sidewise, with the screen. You will find that proposition explained in the Handbook under the head "Keystone Effect," page 331. Yes, I thoroughly agree with your policy with regard to prices. Many managers can get better prices if they gave added value therefor, and if they only thought so, and had the courage of their convictions.

Where to Put the Operating Room.

Morton Suarks, Astoria, Long Island, says:

> Have an airdome plot 125 feet east and west, by 100 feet north and south, and am puzzled as to where to put the operating room. That is, should I throw 115 or 100 feet? Current is A. C., 220 volt, and am using two standard transformers, one rated at 55 amperes and the other at 60 amperes. What size picture would you advise? Also size of lenses? What are your ideas as to material for airdome screens?

There is no material difference as to whether you project 100 or 115 feet. I think I would use a 14 foot picture and the regular objective lens. To find the equivalent focus, calliper the width of the aperture of your machine, multiply the throw in feet by the width of the aperture in fractions of an inch and divide the result by the width of the proposed picture in feet. The result will be the equivalent focus of the required lens, as nearly as you can get it by figures. As to the materials for an airdome screen, most people use sheet metal, making the joints as smooth as possible and then covering it with flat white lead or zinc paint. Outline the picture with flat black, and make a shadow-box at least four feet wide, flaring out over the screen at the top and sides at an angle of about 45 degrees, though the top may have a considerably sharper angle than that, in fact, it may be almost flat. I have never tried it, but believe a screen plastered with cement, the same as is used for sidewalk finish, would make an excellent airdome screen. The only thing I am not certain about is, the cement might possibly, due to expansion and contraction, crack, though I do not believe it would. It must of course be painted or coated with calcimine and, if the latter, protected against rain by a movable waterproof shield.

More Foolishness.

The new building law of the city of Nashville, Tennessee, requires that the operating room of all moving picture theaters erected since the law was passed be located at the rear of the auditorium, with the screen at the front.

This particular scheme has been tried out in several cities and has been discarded by nearly all of them. It is a law composed of four-fifth piffle and the rest pure unadulterated nonsense. In nine cases in ten it operates to detract from the show, and it does not add one single element of safety. In fact the result is exactly the opposite. The theory is that if there is a fire in the operating room the audience won't have to pass near it to get out, therefore they will pass out calmly, and there will be no panic, whereas if the operating room be near the entrance the people have to pass by or under it and there will be panic and probably injury or loss of life. That all sounds good, but it don't work out for the very simple reason that when there is a fire and the people have to pass near the operating room they hesitate and will hold back to some extent through fear of going near the fire, whereas with the fire at the rear of the auditorium there is nothing to check them, and they rush to the door, pile up in a heap and goodnight.

It is another case of lawmakers working on theory without adequate knowledge of practical things. But the really foolish part of the whole business is that if the operating room is properly constructed and the fire shutters properly arranged the audience absolutely will not know there is a fire in the theater, although several reels of film burn. I am not a man who cares to gamble, but will undertake to bet the distinguished officers of the city of Nashville, who evolved this law, any sum they want, in real money, provided it be enough to make the thing worth while, that I can go to Nashville, select an operating room which has fire proof walls and a properly constructed vent pipe of proper dimensions, and, after arranging the fire shutters as they should be arranged, deliberately set fire to a reel of film, or to two or three of them for that matter, and not lay my finger on a solitary thing, but just go outside the room and shut the door and that not one of the audience will know there is a fire until the aforesaid fire has burned itself entirely out. The audience will of course know something is wrong, since the show will be stopped, but it will not know there is a fire.

Why not work along lines of common sense, gentlemen, instead of enacting into law impractical theories which have already been tried out and discarded by other cities. New York City has 600 moving picture theaters. It looked this particular scheme over carefully and turned it down.

As to Brooks' Answer.

John Solar, Watertown, New York, says:

> Referring to Friend Brooks' answer to question 71: in comparing the yearly cost in operating the arc with rheostat, economizer and motor generator, he is taking .3 of an ampere per foot of screen surface with both A.C. and D.C. Now .18 amperes D.C. will give as good, or better illumination at the screen then .3 amperes A.C. Where he has taken 3,000 watts as arc wattage he should have taken not over 1,925 watts as a fair comparison. 1,925 + 67 = 2,873 watts, or, 2.9 k.w., or 14.5 k.w. per five hour day, and, since 52 weeks equal 312 days that would mean 312 × 14.5 × .9 — $405.60 which is the cost of the current to operate the motor generator for one year. This plus $22.50, depreciation, makes a total of $428.10, a saving of $414.94 over the rheostat as compared with a saving of $150.50 as in the answer.

I have given this as Friend Solar wrote it. I haven't time to follow the thing through and compare it with the other article just now, so we will let Brothers Solar and Brooks scrap this particular matter out between themselves.

Ghost Which Sticks.

W. J. Crane, Nashville, Tennessee, says:

> I absorb the department every week, and it is needless to say derive much benefit therefrom. And now here I am with a question. Am using a 6½ and 7½ condenser, projecting a 12-foot picture at 127 feet, taking current through a rotary converter. Have tried two 7½ condensers but still have a blue spot which I have been unable to get out.

We are right now in the middle of experiments designed to determine these things, Brother Crane, but I want you to try this out and tell me exactly what happens. Measure the width of the crater on your carbon. If it is approximately 5/16 of an inch wide, with a 6½ and a 7½ combination, the 6½ next to the arc, have distance between plane of condenser nearest the arc and the machine aperture 18½ inches; with a 7½ — 7½ combination, which I think would be best, make the above distance 19¾ inches. If the width of the crater is ⅜ of an inch, with a 6½ — 7½ combination, make the distance 15¾ inches, and with a 7½ — 7½ make it 16½ inches. If the crater is more than 5/16 and less than ⅜ with a 6½ — 7½ make the distance 17 inches, with a 7½ — 7½ make it 18 inches. In all instances the measurement is from the plane of the condenser nearest the arc to the film. When a 6½ — 7½ combination, the 6½ should always be next the arc, but, as is well known, a 6½ breaks more readily than a 7½; hence the practice has been to put the 7½ next the arc. The tendency to breakage, however, is largely (practically entirely) overcome by the installation of a Preddy or Elbert condenser mount. Also in some of the newer models of machines the matter is fairly well taken care of by heavy condenser holders. Kindly report results on this proposition just as soon as you can. Your condensers should not be more than 1/16" apart. The closer together the better.

Information Wanted.

Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, says:

> I use bio-light carbons for the bottom, and bio carbons for top. I notice as soon as the carbon burns about three-quarters down on a 6-inch carbon, the bottom carbon, which is the bio-light, burns into the shape of a cone. Could you tell me the cause and remedy? I have a 9 x 12 screen with a 65-foot throw, and a screen with a plaster frame around the edges of the screen. Could you tell me what should be done to put the focus inside the screen, as it runs out on the edges? Otherwise I have a fine projection. Kindly tell me if those questions will be in the Handbook. If they are I think I will get one.

Well, my brother, you certainly need it badly enough, Heaven knows, although I would not do anything reckless if I were you. And the price of the Handbook will be equal to the price of quite a number of schooners —if you use them. No, the questions are not in the Handbook, but most of the answers are, if you care to dig them out. You will have to dig, though, as they are not published there in the form of answers to the questions, and what is more, they are not likely to be. I presume what you mean is that your carbons are needling. This may be, and probably is caused by the carbon making poor contact with the bottom carbon jaw. The answer is: Clean the metal inside the carbon jaw. As to the screen matter, why, if anybody can decipher your meaning when you say you have a "12-foot screen with a screen with a plaster frame around the edges of the screen" they are entitled to twenty-five green stamps. As to the picture overlapping, you need a lens of longer focal length, but I am not particularly anxious to answer questions of this kind propounded by operators in a city the size of Philadelphia. I have really published your letter more for the purpose of showing your total ignorance of the most fundamental things. You, an operator in one of the largest cities in the country, where you could serve an apprenticeship and learn your trade right, undertake to pose as an operator without even knowing what to do to reduce the size of your picture. Man, Man! You ought to be ashamed of yourself. If you have a license it is a sad commentary on the licensing powers of the city of Philadelphia, where they pretend to be so very, very strict.

South Bend Roasted.

South Bend, Indiana, is handed the following wallop by a correspondent:

> In the last two issues I noticed several complaints about certain town having punk projection. Well, let me say that South Bend stands at the head of the list in that respect. At one theater "Stop Thief" was shown recently, and I went in to see it. You should have seen the way the actors flapped on and off the screen. The speed at which it was run made the whole thing utterly ridiculous. They show six reels, with an average of twenty slides in one hour and fifteen minutes, or from nine to ten minutes to the reel, and about fifteen minutes for slides. You can judge for yourself what the show is. At another house the projection is slower, but on several occasions I have seen a mis-thread on starting a picture, with a consequent stop to re-thread, and if at the end of fifteen minutes the picture is not finished they cut it off to make up lost time. The less said about the light at both these houses the better. I have on three or four occasions seen it go entirely out while the machine was running, which shows, I think, that the crank twister does not attend very strictly to business. You are on the right track in plugging for better projection, and we do certainly need it here.

This is not by any manner of means all the letter, and, moreover, I have toned it down. We should be glad to hear what explanation South Bend has to make for running reels in nine and ten minutes; also for tolerating operators who commit the faults named. Possibly they are of the $12 per variety, and you can't expect anything very good for wages the common laborer gets.

Denison Replies.

W. H. & J. W. Russell, Denison, Texas, writes:

> I was quite surprised to read the letter of Friend Willitz of Kewanee, Ill. I remember him very well, and believe his criticism of affairs in Denison was not honest. The operator at the Mirror is my brother, and he and I work together, though Wilitz got his name wrong. I am operator at the Queen, but our projection is practically the same as at the Mirror, though our "friend" did not visit my place. He is mighty badly in error about Sherman. All the men over there hold cards, and and also what I think you, yourself, would call real operators. Possibly if the critic would return to Denison and Sherman, and not come directly from a wet town, he might change his opinion.

Well, gentlemen, I don't know about the conditions in Denison. However, I believe a jolt like this once in a while does nobody any particular harm, and, on the other hand, does a lot of good, in that it causes the men to sit up, take notice, look around and consider their own faults, if any there are. As to Sherman; that was an oversight on my part, because I know the men in that town, and they are good operators too. Also I have no reason to suppose the men in Denison are anything else but good men; I hope they are, at least. But the Sherman boys have long been correspondents of this department, and it will take a good deal to convince me that projection in that city is not up to the mark. Also, I was perfectly well aware of the fact that Sherman was union, but somehow or other I did not realize at the moment just what Sherman he (Wilitz) was talking about—that is no excuse, of course, but it is fact just the same. I will be glad to receive information regarding your equipment at any time.

Crank Twister.

Providence, Kentucky, writes:

> At last I have mustered nerve enough to write. Am a crank twister of three years' experience, and hope soon to be a real operator. We have only one theater, "The Dreamland," and a cozy little place it is. The operating room contains a Powers Six A, and a Westinghouse rectifier. Business is dull, but I believe we can say projection is fair. Can you inform me as to the nearest local of the I. A., as I want to join if I can? I attach a sketch of a new three-carbon lamp, the same being taken from the Electrical World. What do you think of it?

Those lamps have been tried out many times. They are all right in their place, but they have not been found suitable for the projection of moving pictures. As to the nearest local, why, I don't even know what part of the state Providence is in. I will have the general office of the I. A. communicate to you the desired information.

The Three-Wire System.

Simon Arkin, New York City, contributes the following on the three-wire system:

> Referring to the "Neutral Wire" in the three-wire system discussion, I would say that you, Mr. James and Mr. Solar are mixing up current with electric pressure.
> In an electric circuit there are three physical phenomena: (1) Difference of Potential, or Electric Pressure, which is measured in volts; (2) Electrical Resistance measured in Ohms; (3) Electric Current measured in amperes. In order to cause an electric current, there must be an electric difference of potential; that is one point in the circuit must be charged higher than the other.
> The Three-Wire System. In the three-wire system two dynamos alike in capacity and voltage (in this case 120) are connected in series between two outside wires, a neutral wire is connected at a point between the two dynamos. The two dynamos being in series their E.M.F. are added; in this case it is 240. The positive is charged with + 120 volts, the negative wire with — 120 volts, the middle being the mean of the two wires is therefore neither positive nor negative, but neutral; and as the three wires are in parallel, the E.M.F. for the whole length of each wire is practically constant; therefore the middle wire is neutral all through its length.

2 WIRE SYSTEM

In a perfectly balanced system, as shown in Fig. 2, the third wire is not necessary at all; not only is it neutral in regard to its E.M.F. but also no current whatever passes through it; and even in case the third wire would be cut, the circuit would continue to flow from every lamp in circuit A to its corresponding lamp in circuit B. The function of the third wire is to act as a rectifier and to adjust the circuit when the load on one side is greater than on the other side of the circuit. In any case the current in the neutral wire is equal to the difference between the currents of the two outside wires. For example, let there be one hundred one-half ampere incandescent lamps on circuit A; and 40 lamps of the same capacity on circuit B; then the plus wire will carry 100 × ½ or 50 amperes, the minus wire will carry 40 × ½ or 20 amperes, the neutral wire will carry 50 — 20 or 30 amperes toward the generators.

"THE 3 WIRE SYSTEM"

Should by any accident the minus wire be cut, the lamps in circuit B would go out, dynamo B would continue to turn idle and not produce any work. In circuit A everything would continue as before, and the neutral wire will carry the full load or 50 amperes toward the generators.

In case the positive wire would be cut, the lamps on circuit A will go out, dynamo A would continue to turn idle. In circuit B everything would be in perfect order and the neutral wire would carry 20 amperes from dynamo B toward the lamps on circuit B. The neutral wire will remain (except for a small drop in line) neutral in all the above cases, and still have to carry sometimes the full load as shown above. For that reason the neutral wire should be as large as the two outside wires.

I think I won't comment on this. I am using what few brains I have now right up to the limit in other directions, and I will ask you boys to edit the department a few weeks, and do the criticising.

Not Necessary, But Advisable.

J. Lieberman, Worcester, Massachusetts, inquires:

> Would like to know if it is necessary to have part which Power's calls "motor drive attachment," which fastens to the base of the machine head and drives the machine through the large idler gear. I intended to take out the idler gear shaft and extend it to the desired length and put a pulley on the end of the shaft, belting from there to a motor placed under the magazine. Could it be worked that way? The part costs $7.50, whereas the other scheme would cost but 50 cents.

Yes, Friend Lieberman, it would only cost you fifty cents, but I don't think you could get satisfactory results that way. You could attach a small counter shaft to the wall and belt from the motor to a large pulley on the counter shaft and then from a small pulley on counter shaft to a pulley on the spindle you speak of, and that would work all right. But you would have to dope out the correct pulley sizes to give the speed wanted. I don't believe you can put a pulley large enough to reduce the speed on the end of that particular shaft. I am not certain about that, but I don't think you could, and if you could you would have to put a bearing outside the pulley, as the shaft is a very short one and is carried by one rather narrow bearing in the frame. True, the attachment will cost you $7.50, but in the long run it would perhaps be cheaper to get it. That, however, is a matter for your own judgment. You can use the counter shaft scheme if you wish to.

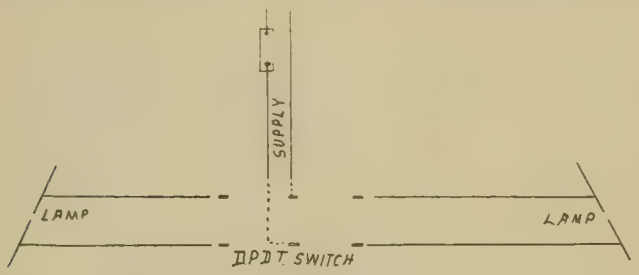
Resistance Connections.

W. J. Houston, Newbern, Tennessee, says:

> Am using a Powers Six A machine on 220 D.C. supply, through a rheostat. I want to install another projector, and am puzzled. Can I operate two machines through one set of rheostats? Both arcs at no time would be burning simultaneously more than two minutes, while changing from one picture to the other. Have a new 220 D.C. Power's rheostat. The city electrician tells me I am pulling about 35 amperes with one machine. Please explain how the two machines may be operated through one set of rheostats.

No, you cannot put all the current for the two arcs through one set of rheostats and dissolve one picture into the other. You can connect your rheostats as indicated in the sketch and it will work, but in the long run it will pay you better to get another set of rheostats. If you have another rheostat why use the same one for both machines? The reason you cannot dissolve one picture into the other, taking current for both arcs through one rheostat, lies in the fact that when you strike one arc the other will go out. There is no such thing as a "D.C. rheostat." Any rheostat may be used on either A.C. or D.C.



If you are taking 220 with metered service it seems to me you might better get a motor generator set for reducing your current. With 220, pulling 35 amperes, you are using about 1,700 watts at the arc, and taking 7,700 from the line. In other words, you are using about 1,700 watts in the actual production of light, and wasting 6,000 in resistance—rather tough on the light company if you pay a flat rate and mighty expensive for you if on metered service.

Carbon Size.

S. E. Shaw, Ithaca, New York, says:

> Is there any other reason aside from fast burning and some difficulty in handling, why such large carbons are used? A smaller carbon will give a much hotter crater and better efficiency. C. S McDowell, in a paper on searchlights, in an issue of the A. I. E. E. proceedings, brings out some facts which may be of interest to the department. In his tests the standard 110 amperes was used, first with carbons 1¼ inches in diameter and second with ⅝ inch carbons (the sizes for positive in each case, the negative being still smaller). By using a smaller carbon it was possible to increase the illumination on an object about a half mile away for nearly 300 per cent. The increased current density in the positive gives a long, deep crater having a much higher temperature. The increased temperature forms hydrocarbon vapor which envelopes the carbons, preventing the oxidation and giving the effect of an enclosed arc, so that the carbons are not consumed so rapidly as might be expected. It is also interesting to note that the feeding mechanism of the lamp rotated the carbons as they were fed in, thus keeping the crater in the center. Do I understand than an ideal shutter is one giving equal periods of light and darkness? If that is the case, I am going to light on your neck and disagree. And if you are willing to read it I am going to prove to you that you are full of hop, and that periods of equal light and darkness is the condition at which flicker is greatest. Also there is some dope on flicker which may be new to you. In closing, let me say your department is a rapidly growing factor in the advancement of the "movies" from their present to a higher plane which they are bound to achieve, and this higher plane will be achieved by more artistic presentation and themes. Still the best of them retain a little of the old Nickelodeon spirit.

No, Neighbor Shaw, I don't think "The Birth of a Nation" retains any of the old Nickleodeon spirit. I hereby invite you to land your air craft on my devoted neck. Yes, the shutter which gives the best results, according to all experiments (experiments, not theories, Brother Shaw) is a three-wing shutter, in which the blades are of equal width with each other and of equal width with the light openings. That is the dope up to date. If you can produce anything that will work out better in practice, as well as in theory, get busy. If I am wrong I am perfectly willing to admit that fact, and accept your improved ideas, but first, my dearly beloved sir, you have got to show me I am wrong, not only theoretically, but in practice as well. In other words, by practical experiments. The "Queer Proposition" has been ditched. As to the carbons, why I think there is a great deal of difference in a searchlight proposition, where the carbons are set central, and in a projection set where the crater must be to a certain extent on the side of the carbon. So far as I know no exhaustive tests have been made to determine this particular point, but some of the best operators in the country—men of mature years and experience—are using ¾ inch carbons on 40 amperes D. C., having changed from carbons of smaller diameter, and they claim they get better results. That is about all I can tell you at the present time. Possibly I may be able to determine this matter by actual experiment a little later, but just now I am devoting every energy to the light ray proposition, and other special work which is keeping me simply standing on my head, and will keep me in that delightful position until about the first of September.

An Old Timer.

P. H. Brown, Springfield, Missouri, says:

> If, at any time there is anything I can do to help you improve projection I am yours to command. Should you have any tests or experiments which you want tried out at any time, or anything new you want tested, just call on me or send them on. I have as well-equipped a shop as any in the country, and can make almost any kind of test you can think of; also, I will be glad to do it for the benefit of our department. I am not a beginner, but one of the old school. Began operating in 1898, and put in several years on the road. Have everything you have ever written for the World on file, even way back in 1908, and as I write there is in front of me on top of the file, April 4, 1908, Page 284, "Lessons for Operators," by F. H. Richardson, Operator, Chicago. When you come west just drop in. Don't let me know when you are coming and I dare you to criticise my picture very much.

I appreciate Brother Brown's offer to conduct experiments. Possibly we may call upon him. I am glad to keep in touch with old-timers who shot pictures at the screen in the days when everything was done by the rule o' thumb. My writing for the World goes considerably further back than the article named. I do not know exactly when I did begin, but it must have been in the early part of 1907, though that is a guess. Some time I am going to get mad and go through the files and look the matter up.

Shutter Trouble.

Roy A. Wheland, Uhrichsville, O., writes:

> Here is a puzzling proposition. Am running a 1A Motiograph, 1913 model, and have been getting excellent results up to a month ago, when travel ghost developed. If after the shutter was set, a dozen or so feet of film were run at moderate speed the same circumstance would arise. The shutter is an inside double cone one. During a test of the machine one blade of the outside leaf was broken off. (A piece of it, I think, he must mean, Ed.) As an experiment I broke off the blade of the opposite leaf so that both were the same shape, and have been running that way until I can get a new shutter. Now, the puzzle is, what caused the travel ghost? When the framing device is lowered as much as possible the machine runs O. K., but if raised the shutter hits and makes an awful racket. What is the cause?

Your letter is not clear with regard to the travel ghost, though I should say it was probably due to worn gears and parts. I think it highly probable you need to send the head to the factory for repairs; of that I am practically certain. The noise you speak of is undoubtedly due to the ball sockets, 0-56, Plate 4, page 252 of the Handbook, being worn. I think the shutter strikes because you have the blades bent out too straight, and that, too, might account for your travel ghost proposition. In fact it probably would. I would advise you to send that machine to the factory for a thorough overhauling.

Instructions Wanted.

I. Chaple, Knox, Indiana, asks:

> Will you advise me as to the method of lantern slide making, or where I can get that kind of dope? The kind I mean are made from post cards, about 1 x 1¼ inches and have lettering around the pictures. Have tried several ways, but find I cannot get the background dense enough to look black on the screen.

The probability is you are not using the right kind of a developer. I think Brother James can steer you right. He is hereby requested to communicate with you.

Comments on the Films

General Film Company.

THE AMATEUR NURSE (MinA), April 15.—Straight out-and-out farce runs riot in this one-reel photoplay, a live baby assisting Harry La Pearl to roll up the laughs. The action is lively and amusing, the entire cast working valiantly to achieve both results.

THE EBBING TIDE (Biograph), April 19.—A most pathetic one-reel little drama, the heroine dying from blighted love. The atmosphere of the Scotch fishing village, where the scenes are laid, is skillfully reproduced. Marie Newton, Chas. H. Mailes, Ivan Christy and Joseph McDermott give verisimilitude to their respective characters.

THE MYSTERY OF THE SILENT DEATH (Essanay), April 19.—The villain in this one-reel drama is the real thing, and the diabolical way in which he attempts to gain possession of his wife's fortune is worthy the invention of Edgar Allen Poe. A thrilling photoplay. Lester Cuneo, Beverly Bayne and Albert Roscoe are the principals and do excellent work.

THE SILVER CUP ("Road o' Strife" Series No. 3) (Lubin), April 19.—This instalment of Emmet Campbell Hall's mystery story, with the introduction of a new character into the action, carries events forward in a leisurely but interesting manner. John E. Ince is excellent as the new-comer, Abner Gray, Crane Wilbur and Mary Charleson still retain the leading roles.

HEARST-SELIG NEWS PICTORIAL, NO. 31, 1915 (Selig), April 19.—U. S. coast artillery at practice, San Francisco, is the most interesting item of this instalment. General Victorino Huerta arriving at New York; training police dogs at Elmhurst, Pa.; U. S. Navy's diving experts leaving San Francisco for Honolulu; the Kron Prinz Wilhelm at Newport News; views on the Lipton yacht "Erin," and the War Pictures are also shown.

THE TAMING OF RITA (Vitagraph), April 19.—This one-reel comedy is a joy. The story has been told a thousand different ways, but it's all so bright and so filled with love and laughter, that it never grows old. Margaret Gibson makes a captivating Rita. The photography is not quite up to the Vitagraph standard.

MARTHA'S ROMEO (Edison), April 20.—There is much good sport in this one-reel farce, Jessie Stevens' spacious personality and broad comedy method being just what the title role requires. Wm. A. Wadsworth makes a fond (of-the-lady's-boodle) Romeo, and Arthur Housman has a prominent part in the fun-making.

LOTTA COIN'S GHOST (Kalem), April 20.—In this instalment of the "Ham" comedies, "Ham" and "Bud" stray from the path of rectitude, but, even as midnight marauders, the Spirit of Mirth keeps them company. They secure no booty, but bestow a largess of laughter upon all beholders. A welcome release.

MIXED FLATS (Lubin), April 20.—The comedy complications of this one-reel farce film deal humorously with mistaken identity and the funny side of flat life. Ben Walker and Babe Hardy are expert leaders of the male contingent, and Mabel Paige and Nellie Farren do a like service for the female members of the cast.

THE CONVERSION OF SMILING TOM (Selig), April 20.—Another one-reel western romance in which the heart of an outlaw is shown to have that share of goodness of which Shakespeare speaks. Tom Mix is, of course, the fascinating bandit, a character that he has made his own. Louella Maxam is the attractive young woman who coaxes the bad man's nobler nature to the surface. She makes such a result more than possible.

SLEEP, BEAUTIFUL SLEEP (Edison), April 21.—Raymond McKee has the leading role in this one-reel farce, and works vigorously to give the film the necessary rapid action. The motive is humorous, and will engender a fellow feeling in many a slave to the alarm clock. Dallas Welford and Maxine Brown add strength to the cast.

THE FACE AT THE WINDOW (Selig), April 21.—A one-reel drama of average merit, this offering has the usual wrongly-accused hero who barely succeeds in establishing his innocence. Well played by Lamar Johnstone, Joseph Hazleton, Harry Huckins and Edith Johnson.

THE GUTTERSNIPE (Vitagraph), April 21.—The story of this one-reel comedy-drama "is too good to be true." A street waif with a heart of gold, a buried treasure, and a life of ease and new frocks for the "Snipe's" future—all the delights of a fairy tale Lillian Walker fills the physical measure of her role to overflowing, but acts the waif with consummate art. Charles Kent and Darwin Karr are, as usual, thoroughly competent.

TO HAVE AND TO LOSE (Biograph), April 22.—There is undeniable power in this one-reel drama, where a lonely man conquers the hunger of his heart for the sake of the woman he loves. Franklin Ritchie imbues the character with just the right feeling, and Isabel Rea, Frank Newburg and Walter Woodin complete the well selected cast.

DONE IN WAX (Essanay), April 22.—A fantastic one-reel comedy, in which Wallace Beery has large scope for his own particular brand of fun-making. A good comic offering. Bobby Boulder also contributes an amusing piece of character acting.

FEMININE WIT (MinA), April 22.—A western comedy-drama, with a good basic motive, this one-part film moves rapidly along from one interesting incident to another, and comes to a satisfactory "round-up." Cast and camera work excellent.

HEARST-SELIG NEWS PICTORIAL, NO. 32 (Selig), April 22.—Billy Sunday calling upon Mayor Mitchel at the New York City Hall, is the most interesting feature of this number. Grace Darling at the University of California, Palo Alto, the Los Angeles Hans Christian Anderson pageant, Cecil M. Peoli testing a new bioplane, "L" train jumping the rails, baseball and war pictures are also included on the film.

SONNY JIM AND THE VALENTINE (Vitagraph), April 22.—A charming juvenile comedy, in which clever little Bobby Connelly carries off first honors. The story is as sweet and refreshing as a gentle breeze over a clover field. Tefft Johnson, Mabel Kelly, Edwina Robbins and Helen Connelly all add materially to the strength of the cast.

WHEN HEARTS ARE YOUNG (Biograph), April 23.—Reviewed by Lynde Denig on page 393, issue of April 17.

INDISCRETION (Lubin), April 23.—Edgar Jones is the producer of and the hero in this one-reel drama. It is a pleasing little romance, with some pretty scenes for Louise Huff among the blossoms in a flower shop. Good entertainment for lovers of "the happy ending."

THE IDOL OF FATE (Selig), April 23.—Another fantastic comedy in which the fate of the hero is controlled by a wonder-working image. In this case, however, the adventures of the young man are sufficiently amusing to excuse the lack of novelty in the plot. Wm. Scott does creditably with the leading role, and Elsie Greeson and Marion Warner make a captivating team of heart breakers.

WHOSE HUSBAND? (Vitagraph), April 23.—One of those character comedies by Frank Dazey filled with quaint humor and touches of homely life. Jay Dwiggins and William Bletcher are a pair of well-seasoned old sea-salts, and Flora Finch and Kate Price their domineering wives. Harry A Fisher's impersonation of an escaped convict keeps the entire cast at high-water mark.

THE FABLE OF "THE UNFETTERED BIRDS" (Essanay), April 21.—More of the George Ade brand of shrewdly humorous insight into the foibles of humanity. Royal Douglas and Charlotte Mineau have been intrusted with the roles of the unfettered ones. They fully justify their choice.

HIS WIFE'S SECRET (Essanay), April 23.—G. M. Anderson, Lee Willard and Marguerite Clayton constitute the cast of this one-reel drama. Mr. Anderson again enacts a burglar whose better self is aroused by the "one touch of nature that makes the whole world kin." A pleasing bit of sentiment.

JEAN THE FAITHFUL (Biograph), April 24.—An uneventful little drama, the one-reel recording the reward of a faithful heart. Will please lovers of the sentimental. Augusta Anderson, Herbert Barrington and Chas. Perley enter earnestly into the spirit of the photoplay.

THE HEART OF A WAIF (Edison), April 24.—This is a clever, "homey," one-reel drama, its simple story and characters appealing strongly to women and children. Edith Peters is beautifully human as the waif. John Sturgeon plays the old farm as if born with hayseed in his hair; Mrs. William Bectel is also the genuine article as the farmer's wife.

A RACE FOR A CROSSING (Episode No. 24 of the "Hazards of Helen" Railroad Series) (Kalem), April 24.—Helen wins the race, of that you may be very sure! She does it in such a down-right thrilling way, however, that there's mighty little acting about it. It's the real thing!

THE FRESH AGENT (Lubin), April 24.—A half-reel farce, written by Fred H. Hayn, the moral to which is: after selling a junk safety razor, seek safety in flight. An original bit of fooling, very well played by Billy Bowers, Mabel Paige, Frances De Moyer and C. W. Ritchie.

THE HAUNTED ATTIC (Lubin), April 24—On the same reel with "The Fresh Agent." Comic Capers by the Lubin Colored Contingent would be a congruous caption for this Senegambian comedy. John and Mattie Edwards, with the kindly assistance of E. Roseburough, carry out the conception of the author with commendable zeal.

THE TYRANT OF THE VELDT (Selig), April 24.—A jungle-zoo drama, with an almost tragic plot, the scenes of which are laid in Africa. The climax furnishes another of the Selig animal-actors an opportunity to exercise its art.

General Film Company Specials.

THE FACE OF THE MADONNA (Kalem), April 19.—Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson on page 395, issue of April 17.

THE GREAT EXPERIMENT (Selig), April 19.—This two-reel drama, written by James Oliver Curwood, has an interesting story and its shifting scenes—first, in this country, then in India, and on board ship—offer unlimited opportunity for the producer, Thomas Santschi. Mr.

Santschi also plays the leading role effectively, and is well supported by Bessie Eyton.

THE QUICKSANDS OF SOCIETY (Biograph), April 20.—Reviewed by Lynde Denig on page 397, issue of April 17.

THE SNOW-BURNER (Essanay), April 20.—Reviewed by James S. McQuade on page 395, issue of April 17.

THE CLOSING OF THE CIRCUIT (Vitagraph), April 20.—A two-part drama, written by that master of sea tales, Morgan Robertson, the story does not follow the beaten track, but presents a series of novel and engrossing incidents, many of them taking place upon a vessel at sea. As usual, all these scenes are splendidly done by the Vitagraph producer, in this case, the credit going to Harry Davenport. Paul Kelly gives a remarkably fine impersonation of the blind boy, and the entire cast is worthy of mention.

MIKE DONEGAL'S ESCAPE (Episode No. 13 of "The Girl Detective" Series) (Kalem), April 21.—One of the best of the series, the attention being seized at the opening and held to the end. Paul C. Hurst plays the title role with grim realism, and Cleo Ridgeley, as the Girl Detective, unravels the mystery of the crook's escape with her accustomed ease and smiling assurance. Two reels.

THE TERRIBLE ONE (Lubin), April 21.—Paul Powell, who wrote and produced this three-reel drama, has told a moving tale of love and war. The scenes are laid in Mexico at the present time, the heavy villain becoming a dictator, and the hero an insurrecto leader, known as "The Terrible One." Vigorous action and well-executed battle scenes are among the meritorious features of the photoplay. W. E. Parsons makes a dashing figure of "The Terrible One." George Routh is thoroughly competent as the dictator and Valma Whitman is a beautiful and inspiring Felicia.

DELAYED REFORMATION (Lubin), April 22.—A Shannon Fife two-reeler, the devoted wife who gets into trouble by shielding her criminal brother, furnishing the leading motive. This somewhat familiar theme is deftly handled by both author and producer, Joseph Smiley performing the latter task. A well-rounded cast, which includes Jack Standing, Joseph Smiley, Lilie Leslie and Ann Carmichael, is employed.

OUT OF THE RUINS (Edison), April 23.—Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison on page 67, issue of April 3.

THE CONSPIRACY AT THE CHATEAU (Essanay), April 24.—A two-reel romance with a George Barr McCutcheon atmosphere, that will divert many screen patrons. One of those highly improbable stories for which most of us have a liking. Written by Edwin Balmer. Albert Roscoe, Lester Cuneo and Beverly Bayne sustain the leading roles with their usual skill.

PAWNS OF MARS (Vitagraph), April 24.—Reviewed by Lynde Denig on page 511, issue of April 24.

Mutual Film Corporation.

MUTUAL WEEKLY, NO. 16, 1915 (Mutual), April 22.—Some interesting items in this issue are views in the battle-swept regions of the Carpathians, the Astor yacht "Noma" bearing Vincent Astor and his bride through the Golden Gate pass to the Panama Exposition, the baby camel at the Zoo christened Cleopatra, Bob Fitzsimmons and his new bride, the "Kronprinz Wilhelm" at Newport News, Va., and Jane Addams among other delegates about to embark for the Hague.

THE OPEN DOOR (Reliance), April 26.—Here is rather an unusual offering, not particularly strong, but at the same time entertaining. It is the story of a young woman Raffles who is discovered by the owner of the house as he comes home late one night and finds the door open and the young woman in the act of stealing. A peculiar situation then arises when an officer with a man who pretends to be the owner of the house comes in, has them both handcuffed and taken outside where they are then let go. The open door of course is the door that leads both the young people to happiness.

HOME AGAIN (Komic), April 25.—This is rather a good comedy, if one could overlook its extreme domesticity, for instance, the chase through the halls and bedrooms in the home that the former owner in an intoxicated condition comes back to, in night attire. The wife on first hearing the intoxicated man believes it to be her husband, hence a funny series of incidents, especially when the husband arrives on the scene. The comedy has been well made, and is really amusing.

NO QUARTER (Beauty), April 27.—Although not always consistent in its development, we can easily laugh at this picture, which is straight comedy. The comedy of the situation is gotten out of the fact that Mrs. Smith has had a prepaid gas meter put in the kitchen. On the night of her daughter's engagement dinner the gas runs out and quarters are scarce. In the darkness the young lover squeezes the hand of the wrong woman, and trouble of another source enters. The production has been well made, barring one or two inconsistencies.

CHECKMATE (Majestic), April 27.—There is not a very convincing story in this picture. It would be rather an unusual instance where a father would refuse ever to see his own baby because it cost its mother her life. The situation is too overdrawn to be convincing. The rest of the story treats of how the girl's guardian tries to marry her in order to share her fortune. There are some thrilling incidents in the picture.

THE BURIED TREASURE (Reliance), April 28.—A story of the seashore, and only moderately interesting. It treats of a box of hidden treasure, the location chart of which is found in the sand by the young lover. A race to find the treasure takes place between the dissenting parties, namely a rival suitor for the hand of the fisherman's daughter, the fisherman himself and the lover. Much of the suspense of the picture is extracted from the fact that the girl's father tries to make her marry the first mate on his ship.

THE LITTLE SOLDIER MAN (Majestic), April 30.—A juvenile number, with Mildred Harris, Paul Willis and Bobby Feuhrer in the principal parts. The hero dreams that the girl's soldier doll comes to life. This is attractively pictured and makes an enjoyable light subject.

THEIR ONE LOVE (Thanhouser), May 2.—A pretty story of Colonial days has been utilized as the basis of this production which is an exceptionally good: The Thanhouser twins play the feminine leads. Their one lover goes to the war and is killed. This portion of the story is interspersed with effective scenes of battle alternated with domestic scenes showing the twins and illustrative of their feelings and thoughts.

THAT DOG GONE SERENADE (Royal), May 8.—A comedy number which proves quite amusing in places. The best scene is where the young man's serenade causes a dog to howl. This feature was used before in a production by the same company we believe. The story itself is only fairly strong.

Mutual Film Corporation Specials

GOD IS LOVE (Reliance), April 24.—The story of this two-reel production has evidently found its inspiration in "Silas Marner," the George Eliot novel. The picture has been made by Arthur Mackley and is in many ways an attractive one. The sub-titling is not particularly well done, and we believe that the general opinion would be that the picture is well enough made to speak for itself without any religious sentimentality being protruded in sub-title or otherwise, for a well-meant wording often contains a super-emotional element that is apt to call forth ridicule. Arthur Mackley, as the hermit, does very fine work, as do also little Betty Marsh, Howard Gaye and Claire Anderson.

FOR THE HONOR OF BETTINA (Majestic), April 25.—This is an Italian romance filmed in two reels, with Teddy Sampson in the feminine lead, and Lloyd Ingraham and Frank Bennett in the principal male roles. The production takes the form of melo-drama, and is fairly entertaining.

THE DAY OF RECKONING (American), April 26.—Vivian Rich, David Lythgoe, Louise Lester, Jack Richardson, and Charlotte Burton are the players in this two-reel production. It is unfortunate that the story is one of the overdrawn sort. A young mother, whose husband has deserted her, marries a bachelor without telling that she is already married. She has her friend bring the child to her, pretending that it belongs to another woman, and asking her to care for it. The secret of course is revealed in the end, and the former husband, a gambler, is ignored and the woman is forgiven by her latest husband and the "happy ever after" idea closes the picture.

THE SPARK IN THE EMBERS (Broncho), May 5.—A two-reel story of an artist and his model by Thos. H. Ince. The leading characters are portrayed by Frank Borsage, Elizabeth Burbridge and Watler Edwards. The artist protects the girl from his rival and marries her. The rival employs the girl's father, a released convict, to destroy the young husband's painting. The father goes to the house, recognizes the picture as that of his daughter. He spares the painting but upraids the girl until she gives proof of her marriage. Later he is killed without the husband learning the relationship. The story is well constructed and works up to some dramatic situations at the close.

THE MAN FROM NOWHERE (Domino), May 6.—A two-reel production with Wm. S. Hart in the leading role. The opening scenes catch the interest at once, picturing a lawless western town in which a sheriff is about to be elected by order of the government. The residents, as a joke, elect the girl's father, a drunken reprobate, whom they afterward annoy exceedingly. The Man from Nowhere then shows up, falls in love with the girl and acts as deputy sheriff. The desert scenes were very good, but the plot was not quite so interesting here. It would have been interesting to see more of the unwilling sheriff. A good western number.

THE KITE (Kaybee), May 7.—A two-reel number with a scientific problem in it. The girl's father has invented a kite which is used to detect approaching storms. The assistant is in love with the old man's daughter. A visiting friend meets with sudden death on the roof garden one evening. Dunbar, scientific detective, traces the crime to the assistant, who had attempted to kill the girl's father by means of an electric current from the kite because he would not consent to the marriage. This problem is interesting, but quite complicated; even after the explanation it is none too clear. At the same time the story has sufficient novelty to hold the interest well.

CAPTAIN MACKLIN (Mutual Masterpicture—Majestic), April.—Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison on page 739, issue of May 1.

THE CUP OF LIFE (Mutual Masterpicture—N. Y. M. P. Co.), April 26.—Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison on page 740, issue of May 1.

THE DIAMOND FROM THE SKY (American), May.—The opening three reels of this long anticipated continued photoplay are in no way disappointing. Beginning with the picturesque prologue, in which the fall of a meteor saves the life of Sir Arthur Stanley from the superstitious redskins, the observer is at once plunged into a story of absorbing complications. The two chapters, entitled "The Heritage of Hate," show the later generations of the Stanleys in Virginia. Warfare exists between the colonel and the judge. A daughter is born to the former and he substitutes the boy baby of Hagar, the gypsy, so the inheritance of the diamond and estate will fall to him. A strong beginning.

THE VICTIM (Majestic), May.—Made from the story by Paul West, and produced by George Siegmann, "The Victim," in three reels, is an exceedingly attractive production, because it has been well made, artistically made; and its theme, not new, looks at you from another doorway. Mae Marsh and Robert Harron have the leads, and play with their usual intelligent understanding of the characters which they are portraying. The picture is artistically set, it is very human, and will always please because it is, generally speaking, vividly realistic. The story is of the arrest and imprisonment of an innocent man, his escape from prison, and of the trap unsuccessfully laid for him at a later date when he is a flourishing business man.

Paramount Program.

THE CAPTIVE (Lasky), May.—Reviewed by Lynde Denig on page 743, issue of May 1.

Pathe Exchange Inc.

COL. HEEZA LIAR SIGNS THE PLEDGE, May 3-8.—This is an exceedingly funny animated cartoon, illustrating how it feels to be over intoxicated. As a result of his disturbing experiences the Colonel decides to join the temperance ranks. This is on the same reel with "Picturesque Andalusia."

PICTURESQUE ANDALUSIA, May 3-8.—An especially interesting series of views through the hills and valleys of Andalusia, showing the quaint Gypsy residences and villages, customs and people, all picturesque, though unprogressive. On the same reel with the above.

MONUMENTS OF PISA, May 3-8.—An interesting journey through the streets of Pisa, Italy, showing its principal monuments and other points of interest, including the leaning tower. On the same reel with "A Study in Insects."

A STUDY IN INSECTS, May 3-8.—On the same reel with the above, this consists of an instructive series of views of insects and their larvae, including our friend, the Mosquito. Butterflies of different varieties are among the insects shown.

JUST TRAMPS, May 3-8.—A farce comedy produced by Youngdeer, and worthy of considerable praise. It has of course a great deal of the slapstick element, but this has, however, been worked into the picture in a more or less consistent manner. The two tramps discovered asleep in a freight car, follow a rude awakening with a tactful search for food.

Pathe Exchange Inc., Specials;

THE NEW EXPLOITS OF ELAINE (Episode No. 3), May.—Reviewed by Margaret I. MacDonald on page 740, issue of May 1.

UNFOUNDED JEALOUSY, May 3-8.—A two-part production which has been produced in a manner to excite interest. Lillian Wiggins is featured in the picture, the story of which treats of a wife's unfounded jealousy, which is fanned into a wicked flame through the innocent tattle of a child. Later, after being almost the cause of her sister's death, she discovers that the seemingly intimate relations between her sister and her husband was caused by a successful attempt on the part of the sister to help the husband out of a menacing gambling debt.

United Film Service.

AVARICE (Ideal), May 3.—A strong two-part production which has been played and directed in an artistic and experienced manner. It is a melodrama of the gold fields, and illustrates clearly the significance of its title at its worst. The avaricious man kills his partner because he will not reveal the whereabouts of the bags of gold which he has hidden. Later the child of the dead man is apprised of their whereabouts by a young doctor who has accidentally fallen into the cellar of the old cabin where the skeleton of the dead miner still lies, and finds a diary in which the message for his child is written.

THE TRUNK MYSTERY (Superba), May 4.—This is a rough and tumble sort of a comedy of no great merit, but, nevertheless, adapted to please a certain class of moving picture theater patrons.

THE SHOP NUN (Empress), May 5.—An excellent moral has been aimed at in this two-part picture from the Gaumont studios. Considerable of its force has, however, been obliterated by the fact that its subtitles are more sentimental than practical. The story and its intent are good, but its development is not vividly realistic, and leaves the impression that sentiment has predominated. The effect would have been much better if the tendency toward the allegorical had been altogether eliminated.

LOUISA'S BATTLE WITH CUPID (Luna), May 6.—Dot Farley features in this production as Louisa, a middle-aged spinster, who objects to her young sister associating with cowboys. The cowboy lover employs a book agent to make love to Louisa, and the plan working admirably, all are made happy.

THE FORTUNE TELLERS (Starlight), May 6.—An Aubrey and Kendig comedy of considerable merit. The idea on which the picture is based is a good one, and allows for plenty of good business. The two loafers who have long ago agreed that the world owes them a living have decided to go into the fortune telling business. They get mixed up with a female Raffles, as usual both fall in love with the same lady, especially with her fortune, and through these circumstances some comical incidents arise.

TOLD IN THE ROCKIES (Lariat), May 8.—This is a two-reel production with a very good story, which has, however, not been particularly well presented in the picture. There is a tendency to jump about too much from one location to another without connecting links that would have made the picture story more smooth. There are also many interesting points about it, and the production would no doubt be very acceptable to the casual observer.

Universal Film Manufacturing Company.

ANIMATED WEEKLY, NO. 163 (Universal), April 21.—Huerta in New York, President Wilson opening the baseball season in Washington, negro baptisms in the Mississippi, these are but a few features of this very entertaining Number.

THE CURE OF THE MOUNTAINS (Laemmle), April 25.—An exceptionally attractive film story, with Charles Alexander, Helen Leslie, Frank Lloyd and others in the cast. The mountain stream and other beautifully pictured scenic features make the observer begin to think of vacation time. The story is also strong. A good offering.

OVER THE BOUNDING WAVES (Joker), April 26.—Max Asher and Wm. Franey are rivals in this sea story for the hand of Gale Henry. Shultz at first loses out, but later gets himself appointed captain and turns the tables on his rival. A typical number, telling an interesting yarn, well pictured and amusing throughout.

THE BLANK PAGE (Imp), May 3.—Etienne Girardot, Violate Mersereau and Wm. J. Welsh appear in this number. It is the story of a young wife neglected by her scientific husband. The duel in the dark was the most novel feature. The number is not exceptional but holds the interest quite well.

CAUGHT BY A THREAD (Nestor), May 4.—This comedy plot, written by Tom Gibson, is unusually clever. The young wife, suspicious of her husband, slips a spool of thread into his pocket and traces him by it. But the husband gets wise and passes the spool over to a messenger boy. Subsequent developments are very amusing. A good offering.

FATHER WAS NEUTRAL (L-KO), May 5.—A low comedy number, featuring Billy Ritchie and Peggy Pearce. He flirts with the girl and goes home with her; the father objects and he carries the girl off in a trunk, over the roof. The humor does not come up very strong in this; an average number.

ROSES AND THORNS (Big "U"), May 6.—Edna Maison and Ray Gallegher appear in this offering, written by Helen Bailey. The married man on a camping trip meets the girl of the woods, bringing a test of his better qualities. The story is worked out with a fair degree of strength and is about of average interest.

COUNTING OUT THE COUNT (Sterling) May 6.—Billy Reeves and his pal appear in this as two vaudeville actors. He poses as a count and gets a jag on at a society function. The humor of this is not very strong. The closing scenes are of the knock-about type.

TONY (Imp), May 7.—King Baggot and Jane Gail appear in this as an Italian and his wife. Tony comes to America, meets with an injury and is cared for by the father of the child he saved. The arrival of his wife and daughter from Italy made a pretty close. A pleasing story of fair strength.

IN THE HILLS BEYOND (Powers), May 8.—The story of two men and a girl, with pretty rural settings. The story itself is conventional; its chief appeal is in the attractive scenes and pleasing cast.

Universal Film Mfg. Company Specials.

LOST IN LONDON (Universal Special), May 3.—No. 9 of The Black Box series. An absorbing number in two reels. Craig is still at large on the estate of Lord Ashleigh. A new mystery develops when Lord Ashleigh is found murdered. Craig is finally taken and locked in the wine room, but escapes. The girl assistants of Quest also meet with new adventures in this. The incidents are now following clearly and smoothly and the story is very absorbing.

FOR CASH (Victor), May 3.—A two-reel number featuring Warren Kerrigan and Vera Sisson. He appears as an artist and paints a picture of the girl in the nude. The father objects and separates the two. Later the father dies and the girl's guardian continues keeping them apart. But they meet accidentally, he wins fame and love follows. This is very conventional and not particularly attractive in settings. The principals are interesting, but their work furnishes the chief strength of the production.

THE FAITH OF HER FATHERS (Gold Seal), May 4.—A very sincere three-reel picturing of a Jewish religious theme, adapted from a novel by Bruno Lessing, the scenario being written by Isador Bernstein. Cleo Madison, Murdock MacQuarrie and Joe King have the leading roles. The story shows the manner in which a rabbi's daughter falls in love with a young Christian. The question arises as to which she shall follow—love or the faith of her people. The problem is handled in a reverent and intensely interesting way. Chief in interest is the scene in the synagogue, where the girl elects to remain true to her religion, though her heart breaks and she afterward dies. A powerful religious subject.

THE LITTLE GIRL OF THE ATTIC (Laemmle), May 5.—A two-reel number written by Calder Johnstone, with a touch of heart interest in it. It is a story of the civil war period, though the war itself is not the main feature. It pictures the way in which a grandfather goes to look up his granddaughter after years of estrangement. The cast is pleasing; Marc Robbins does a fine character bit in the part of the old darkey. The plot is well constructed and the good sentiment of the piece makes a pleasing impression on the observer.

RENE HAGGARD JOURNEYS ON (Rex), May 6.—Ben Wilson, Esther Banks, Wm. J. Welsh and Dorothy Phillips appear in this two-reel number. Rene is first seen condemned to execution for murder in the first degree. He then tells his mother the story of the crime, which is pictured in detail. The sister had been lured from home and abandoned by the villain. She afterward married a man who became governor, the villain shows up and is killed by the brother. This plot is very familiar but it here seen in well-constructed form. The cast and photography are pleasing. The offering is one of average interest.

ALMOST A KING (Nestor), May 7.—A two-reel comedy, written by Al E. Christie, with Lee Moran, Stella Adams, Jack Dillon and Billie Rhodes in the cast. The American delicatessen man falls heir to a distant throne and deserts his wife and family to assume possession. Later the wife and her children appear and another gains the throne. The first reel of this is a little slow, but there is considerable amusement in the second. The cast is agreeable and the comedy quite pleasing in spite of its rather drawn out character.

George A. Wright

IF GEORGE A. WRIGHT, newest of the Edison players, had not been such a good actor, he in all probability would today be an Edison director. He was standing about one day, getting on to the difference between the motion picture director and the director of the stage, preparatory, when one of the directors asked him to play a detective. When the film, "On the Stroke of Twelve," was shown, all hands declaimed against taking so good an actor from the ranks, even though he was a good director. And Mr. Wright is puzzled as to whether to be flattered or disappointed.

George A. Wright.

Coming from a theatrical family, blood told early when he ran away from college at sixteen to go on the stage in "Alvin Joslin." His father, an influential politician in Lansing, Michigan, where the runaway first saw the light, opposed his escapade and corralled him back to college where he spent a year of misery until he broke loose again and this time ran away further—to New York—to take the cockney in "The Silver King." Not long after he joined the famous Salisbury Troubadours, considered to be the first musical comedy company in America. Later he was with the first "tank drama" of the palmy days, "Lost in New York," when he found himself again with Walter E. Perkins in "My Friend from India." Then came a number of engagements till he played the title role in "Jimmie Fadden" and two years with the all-star cast of "Shenandoah," with Otis Skinner, Mr. Wright playing the American lieutenant which is considered the best short part ever written.

He then became associated with the Charles Kleine productions as player and director, in time taking the original Johnson in "Bobby Burnit," and the grouch in "The Country Boy." Later he left for London, where he was immediately secured for the well-known part of the shipping clerk in "Bought and Paid For." He left "Within the Law," where he played the strong character part, Joe Carson, to go to Edison.

"BIRTH OF A NATION" GREAT SUCCESS.

The facility with which motion pictures can paint history has been graphically shown the past week in the big Griffith epic, "The Birth of a Nation," at the Liberty, New York. It is just fifty years since some of the most memorable events of American history associated with the Civil War took place. In this comprehensive screen drama, Griffith has been able to make these stirring occurrences live as faithfully as if one were participating in the actual events.

The production started Sunday, April 18th, upon its third month, and is going as strong as ever, having aroused more interest than any offering of the current season on the New York stage. Its success here has been duplicated in Boston, Los Angeles and San Francisco and plans are now shaping for a Chicago production. Nearly 125,000 people have seen the picture and the receipts have already passed the $100,000 mark in New York City. This is the biggest record of any theatrical offering in New York for this period.

Richard R. Neill With McIntosh

RICHARD R. NEILL wishes to say that he is no longer with the Edison Co., in fact that he has not been for some time, having played the lead and directed the Naval part of a nine real feature picture for Henry W. Savage called "Uncle Sam at Work" which made a tremendous hit at the Auditorium Theatre, Chicado, and will shortly be seen in New York for an indefinite run.

Mr. Neill has been especially engaged by Burr McIntosh, to play "Robert" in "Colonel Carter of Cartersville" being directed by Howell Hansel. Later Mr. Neill will make known the plans that he has been working on for months.

Richard R. Neill.

Mr. Neill was well-known on the stage before going into the pictures. He joined the Edison Company several years ago and in "The Spirit of the Gorge," he was the first white man ever to take a canoe through the foaming rapids of Au Sable Chasm. After smashing two canoes and swim ming to the shore the director refused to risk a third canoe.

It was Mr. Neill who played "Kavanagh" in "The Relief of Lucknow." The realism of his work when disguised as a Sepoy, he gets through the lines and swims across the river to carry a message to General Havelock, is best shown by the remark made by one of the four survivors of that terrible time, when the picture was rolled off for their benefit in a room in Gerrard street, London: "That's him," the old fellow exclaimed. "That's Kavanagh. He was the only man, too, that could have done it."

Mr. Neill played the lead in some of the best pictures the Edison Co. ever sent out: "An Unexpected Reward," "A Wireless Romance," "The Doomed Ship," "The Quarrel on the Cliff," taken in Cuba; "The Cowpuncher's Glove," taken at Banff and the Capiliano Canon; "The Romance of the Leaves," "The Spirit of the Gorge"; also the lead in the now famous "Curable Disease," taken in the Printers' Home, Colorado Springs, and many others.

"JARR FAMILY" PICTURES POPULAR.

Ever since the Vitagraph Company released "The Jarr Family Discovers Harlem," the first of Roy L. McCardell's episodes relating to the domestic troubles of the Famous Jarr Family, the visualization of his stories on the screen have become more popular, if anything, than when published in the newspapers where they were originally offered the public. It is the intimacy of seeing Mr. McCardell's well-known characters in action that makes the photoplay attractive and the announcement of a new picture in the series is sure of a hearty welcome. Following "The Jarr Family Discovers Harlem," "Mr. Jarr Brings Home a Turkey," "Mr. Jarr and the Lady Reformer," "Mr. Jarr Takes a Night Off" and "Mr. Jarr's Magnetic Friend," were released in rapid succession, every release making a distinctive hit.

Harry Davenport is the director for the Jarr Family's activity on the screen. Associated with him in their enactment are Rose Tapley as Mrs. Jarr, Paul Kelly as Willie Jarr, Audrey Berry as Emma Jarr, Frank Bunny as Fritz, and Charles Eldridge as Jabez Smith, the boss; Mr. Davenport impersonating Mr. Jarr.

As a matter of fact, the Vitagraph Company struck such a popular note in their production of this Celebrated Jarr Series, it has become incumbent upon them to release one each week. To meet this demand, Mr. Davenport has just completed "The Jarrs Visit Arcadia," which is scheduled for release May 10, and is at work on "Mr. Jarr and the Dachshund," with "Mr. Jarr Visits His Home Town," "Mrs. Jarr's Auction Bridge" and "Mr. Jarr and the Loving Cup" in preparation, to be released every succeeding Monday of each week.

OBSERVATIONS

BY OUR MAN ABOUT TOWN.

TEDDY ROOSEVELT is having an awful time at Syracuse. It is either awful "jolly," or awful miserable. Barnes, of New York ("not Mr. Barnes of New York"), is having the same time. By direct, cross, re-direct and re-cross examination the principals are affording the voters much food for ballot scripts. We should worry—us moving picture people. Yet, why not? A suit has been brought against the theatrical trust. If the routine of the political case is followed in the theatrical suit the sensations will be far more effective than in the other. Only once a year politics bother the average New Yorker, and he is the home-stayer. About the time the political campaign is due in New York the theatrical man is on the road and not only loses his vote, but also his interest in the election. The theatrical vote in New York City is a big one—when the voters are at home. Heretofore the politicians have been giving the theatrical man the grand "Ha, Ha!" on the vote question. But they can do so no longer. The theatrical man is now a habitat of the motion picture studio and what he does not know about politics would not benefit either of the Syracuse litigants.

Since this Roosevelt-Barnes libel suit reached trial I have been forced to wonder that so many New York actors know so much about politics. One man remembers when Roosevelt was Police Commissioner because he was in stock in this city that year, and motion pictures were practically a myth at that time. Another well remembers when the same man was Governor of New York. "I was in stock, too," says he. "If my memory does not fail me the picture stores were just about getting their hold," says he. Another says: "They're all wrong. I was in stock at Washington, D. C., when 'Teddy' was President. If I am not mistaken it was one of his daughters who christened the pleasure yacht of the German Emperor. I think it was the 'Victor.' It was around that time that the so-called nickelodeons got their start."

And so it is. The profession seems to be busy in trying to establish the dates when motion pictures were first before the public, when they first took their upward bound and when they assumed their portion as a bomb to the field of "real art." Almost everybody is trying to impress upon the patient listener that he was the first discoverer of what motion pictures were and what they were bound to be.

The State of New York, Pensylvania, California and Illinois, and the country at large, owe to the moving pictures credit for creating the present number of actor-voters. Many leading men made the boast in the past that their periods of illness, urgent telegrams from home, etc., were really only the following up of pre-arranged programmes to enable them to perform the patriotic duty of voting. Of course, some really went home to vote. But a census of the theatrical voters of to-day leads to the conclusion that all the actors did not get home. That is, comparing the number of theatrical voters with those of to-day.

Naturally, the uninitiated would ask, "Why the change?" The answer is that the fortunate actors have connected with some moving picture studio at home. He is at home—even if it is a hotel or lodging room. He realizes that he, at least, has a place where he may hang his hat and his coat. He hears the "boys" about him talking about "Roosevelt" and "Barnes." He feels at home again and feels that he would like to, again, become an American citizen and have his vote counted with the rest. And, then, there is the less fortunate fellow who has not yet succeeded in "connecting." But he has hopes. And, having the hope, he sticks close to the trail of "the man who knows when I played" and he, too, decides to make a haven of the home place and "vote with the boys."

It has been a most difficult task to convince some people that motion pictures have been a most important factor in the advancement of the temperance movement. It may be expected that it will be as hard to convince the same people that motion pictures have made more active citizens from the ranks of the theatrical profession than any other agency.

Go into any motion picture center and you will find the players well posted on local as well as national political data. Some will say actors have always displayed knowledge in that respect. But it must be remembered that such knowledge, as a rule, was gained and used by the actors for betting purposes. The cream of political betting has been reaped for years by the bookmakers from the theatrical profession. The actor in California was as ready with his money to get on the candidate for Mayor in New York, or against him, as any voter residing in the city. And yet that actor had no vote to cast anywhere. He was inbued with home pride. He backed his favorite almost to the limit of having his trunk held for board. How must that actor feel now? Instead of jumping from town to town and dreading the effect of a political campaign upon the receipts of the house; instead of listening to the discordant notes of a passing political brass band; instead of heaping falsehoods upon falsehoods in telling local admirers how he would vote for this or that, he feels himself a free man—home again and with not only the right to vote, but the opportunity to do so.

Much of this exuberance is due to the patriotic spirit of Mr. James Young, the able (or one of them, at least) director of the Peerless studio at Fort Lee, N. J. While he toils in New Jersey his heart is still in New York. "It's a long way to Fort Lee," etc. Jimmy says he loves the histrionic art. The days he spent upon the road are pleasant memories to him. He loves to meet and greet the friends of old and talk over old times. Many places he has visited he would like to visit again. Like Al Reeves, he is an old neighbor of everybody he ever met. But, all conditions being satisfactory, he likes to see the little old red school house on the hill and be "with the boys" in the casting of the die when it comes time to vote.

The Roosevelt-Barnes subject came up in a discussion between picture actors as to what kind of a "script" the trial would make. Some thought it would make a great hit preparatory to the next Presidential campaign. Others said they would not touch it because it savored too much of exemplification of the old axiom that "when thieves fall out honest people get their dues." One actor said: "When we get in with a bunch of politicians they try to convince us that our interests are allied; that we should work together and in our travels about the country we should advocate their principals. Of course we have done it because, as a rule—not always, however—we are pretty sure to have good houses when we get back to the homes of our political admirers who have been elected. But I can see that politics and theatricals are not so closely allied. The politician can take the political and witness stand and talk as he pleases. Whether he wins or loses he still continues in the limelight. If he does not succeed in electing himself he still has the satisfaction of knowing that he helped to elect the other fellow. But what of the poor actor? If he attempts to tell state secrets, or even impolitely speaks to the boss of the show, he is liable to not only walk home, but lose out with the theatrical combine as well. "I'm glad I'm with the pictures, hurrah! hurrah!"

"He's about right," said another actor. "Perhaps we do not get as much as we did, or could, on the legitimate stage, but when you figure up the 'lay-offs' and the summer season, together with the fact that we are enabled to sit by our own fireside and be with the people, realize that we really have a country and an interest in it, that when we meet friends we have a home to which we can invite them, and before going to our daily mission we may have the pleasure of seeing our children run off to school; then it is we feel that motion pictures have not only been a blessing to the masses as a form of entertainment, but to the theatrical profession as well. It would be 'God help' with many a professional were it not for the pictures."

NEW LEDERER PRODUCTION.

George W. Lederer's next film production will be one of the most pretentious that has ever been attempted before the camera. Mr. Lederer has obtained the film rights from Charles Frohman of the celebrated drama, "Sunday," in which Miss Ethel Barrymore scored such a triumph in this country and Great Britain. The play will afford great scope as it embraces many different environments of life, and should be a most popular photoplay. In visualizing it, Mr. Lederer will have in mind the adaptability of it for the American as well as the British public, as it is expected that the play will prove most popular in Great Britain.

Plans of Metro

Has Long List of Plays and Prominent Players for Future Presentation.

THE Metro Pictures Corporation, now fully in its stride, makes many announcements of more than passing interest to the trade in general. No concrete statement has been forthcoming from the directors of this concern since their first announcement five weeks ago, but General Manager Rowland and Joseph Engel, treasurer of the company, between them revealed some of the plans of the company for the forthcoming year.

Within the past two weeks, two new producing companies have joined the Metro body. The Dyreda Art Film Corporation, with J. Searle Dawley as director general, will begin releasing through Metro upon completion of their next production which will be Howard Estabrook in "Four Feathers," now being made at the new Dyreda-Metro studio, Broadway and Sixty-first street, New York.

William Faversham.

The other producing company to cast its lot with Metro is The Quality Pictures Corporation, which concern is under the guidance of Fred J. Balshofer and which will release an average of ten pictures a year in which the popular screen star, Francis X. Bushman, will make his appearance, supported by a specially selected cast. For the first Quality-Metro release, "The Second in Command," one of Frohman's former military successes, has been selected and will be released July 5th.

In addition to securing these two creating concerns, and the new centrally located studios, Metro has been busily engaged scouring the legitimate fields for stars and artists of the premier class. Emmet Corrigan, best remembered from his wonderful work in the revival of "Jim, the Penman," and before that as Bill Lalock in "The Deep Purple," and always considered one of the most powerfully impressive actors of the day, was signed by Metro last week for exclusive appearance under the banner of one of the Metro producing companies.

From the Charles Frohman Company, the following plays were purchased: "The Royal Family," "The Mississippi Bubble," "My Wife," "Sky Farm" and "The Second in Command." These plays will be distributed by Metro to its various companies for production.

Emily Stevens, former star of "To-day," niece of Mrs. Fiske and recently seen in the star role of "The Garden of Paradise" at the Park Theater, is working at the Rolfe-Metro Los Angeles Studio on "Cora," which will be released early in May.

Valli Valli in "The High Roads" is this week's release, and "The Shooting of Dan McGrew," with Edmund Breese comes out next Monday. This is a Popular Plays and Players-Metro feature and is said to be even more vivid than "The Call of the North."

The Popular Plays and Players Company, releasing on the Metro program, purchased last week from the Clyde Fitch estate, the following big plays, "Her Own Way," "Her Great Match," "The Girl With the Green Eyes," and "Barbara Fritchie." "Her Own Way" will be done at once with Florence Reed, one of the stars in "The Celebrated Case," in the leading role.

Rolfe will place William Faversham in "The Right of Way" and Ann Murdock will appear in a production of Charles Frohman's former hit, "The Royal Family."

"The Second in Command," with Francis X. Bushman in the principal part will be the initial release of the Quality Pictures Corporation under the Metro banner and big plays and books will follow at intervals of five weeks.

Olga Petrova has been contracted for by the Popular Plays and Players for a period of two years and will appear on the Metro roster every six weeks.

Olga Petrova.

The Dyreda Art Film Corporation has arranged with the Ladies' Home Journal for a series of stories which will appear in that paper and be pictured simultaneously. The two million circulation of that magazine guarantees wide interest for Metro on these productions.

In addition to the above features, Metro contracted with Edward Connelly to appear in the Rolfe production of George Ade's great Southern story which will come to the public about June 10th.

Max Figman and Lois Meredith in "My Best Girl," and Olive Wyndham and Orrin Johnson in "Fighting Bob," are two releases now under way for early release by the Metro people.

"An Enemy to Society," "Once to Every Man," "The Bridge," and Otis Skinner's "Silent Voice" are booked for early appearance through Metro.

With five releases behind it, Metro hopes and is working with the end in view of establishing sufficient studio and laboratory equipment to enable them to double their capacity, which will be a necessity if the present demand is any criterion.

A Good Market for American Films

Anglo-American Distributing Company Formed in London by Edgar Hounsell.

Edward Barry, the well-known film man who had formerly been connected with the Ambrosio branch in New York, and who for the last two years has been located in London, paid a flying visit to this country in the company of Edgar Hounsell, the active partner of the Midlands Exclusives Company of Birmingham, England.

Mr. Hounsell, speaking to a World representative at the Hotel Flanders, New York, said that his company had for some time past been handling Famous Players and Lasky Pictures for the Midlands. He is now opening a new office in London which will make a specialty of distributing American made films in England. The name of the company will be the "Anglo-American Film Distributing Company." The Alliance program will be represented in England by the new company, which will also handle other big American productions. Mr. Barry will be the manager of the distributing company. Mr. Hounsell said that film conditions in England are normal and not at all affected by the war, all reports to the contrary notwithstanding. Long films he said are still popular in England and likely to remain so in the near future at any rate. Mr. Barry plans to return to America in a few months to become the resident American buyer and agent for the Anglo-American Film Distributing Company. He said there was a good demand for American features of the greater length. Messrs. Hounsell and Barry sailed for England on the Lusitania Saturday, May 1st.

SELIG GOING TO COAST.

William N. Selig, president of the Selig Polyscope Company, expects to leave within a short time for Los Angeles, Cal., where he will visit the new Selig Jungle-Zoo, which is rapidly nearing completion. Colonel Selig has spent a small fortune in the upbuilding of this wonderful institution and has never had an opportunity to view the Jungle-Zoo in its completed state. A cordial reception awaits Colonel Selig when he arrives in Los Angeles.

New Officers for World Film

Lewis J. Selznick Forecasts Big Advance With George B. Cox as President and William A. Brady on the Board of Directors.

By Lynde Denig.

LEWIS J. SELZNICK, vice-president of the World Film Corporation, has declared more than once that he did not much care what people said about him as long as they talked. He was ready to be called anything rather than a "dead one," a man who ran in a rut, an imitator of other men, an apostle of precedent. He entered the film game, we have his own word for it, as a business radical, prepared to turn things topsy-turvy and was called a fool for his pains. Strong language, cynical criticism, the innuendos of rivals, never bothered Mr. Selznick in the least. He just laughed and said, "Wait."

Lewis J. Selznick.

But he is human, and like more sensitive mortals he appreciates a man who grasps him by the hand and says, "Selznick, you're right; I'll back you to the limit." When he went down to Wall Street something more than a year ago and gathered two million dollars for the World Film Corporation, he was not greeted in that fashion. Most of the men who ventured money were doubting Thomases, ready to take a chance because they knew Selznick and had faith in him, personally. He declares now that his plans for making a fortune out of pictures looked wild to the Wall Street eye. It could see six per cent. profits, but went blind when he multiplied the figure many times over. "They were not film men; they didn't take a great deal of stock in the future of pictures; none the less they backed me," said Mr. Selznick in a recent interview, "and I made good. Let's call that the first period of the World Film Corporation.

"We began the second on April 24th, at a meeting of the board of directors. I had been telling doubters who couldn't quite comprehend my plans, to wait and watch events turn out as I had prophesied. They did, and I was ready to go further. I wanted to get the genuine, whole-hearted interest and financial support of big men who knew the game and believed I was right; men who could work with me heart and soul because our ideas coincided. I wanted the official positions in this corporation to be occupied by practical film men. The meeting on April 24th brought about the results for which I had been striving. I have always insisted that I would not become president, believing that I can be of greater service in my present capacity. I wanted just such a man as George B. Cox of Cincinnati to head the company."

The election to which Mr. Selznick referred placed Mr. Cox in the chair of president in place of Van Horn Ely. George A. Huhn of Philadelphia became chairman of the executive committee; Joseph L. Rhinock was made an additional vice-president, whereas William A. Brady and Milton C. Work were placed on the board of directors.

"Consider the qualifications of these men," Mr. Selznick continued, "and it is easy to see what their advent means to the World Film Corporation. The fact that they have joined hands with me is answer enough to those who dubbed my methods flighty and wisely shook their heads as they talked of my early financial demise. Had we not accomplished all and more than we promised, no amount of persuasion could have induced so sagacious a business and show man as Mr. Cox to become a part of our enterprise. He occupies high official positions with the Shuberts, Klaw & Erlanger, Marcus Loew and is interested in a number of other concerns. An investor of this stamp looks the field over pretty carefully before becoming identified with a corporation. His great wealth, combined with that of the group headed by George A. Huhn, one of the most powerful bankers of Philadelphia, gives a practically limitless fund to expend on the expansion that we have in view.

"Of Mr. Rhinock I can speak only in the highest terms. His value to the Shuberts and Loew is common knowledge; but few people realize how loyally he has supported me throughout the growth of this business. As vice-president he will be even more closely identified with World Film projects.

"No result of the election, however, gave me a keener personal satisfaction than Mr. Brady's acceptance of a place on the board of directors. I am certain that it means a great deal in the artistic advancement of our product. Everybody recognizes in Mr. Brady one of the keenest showmen this country has produced. He knows, as few do, the possibilities of a play and we will have the benefit of his advice in the selection of material, for he is going to be an active director in everything pertaining to World Film policies.

"I think I may say without exaggeration that he is the one theatrical man I know, who thoroughly agrees with me on certain salient principles of this industry. In the first place, a picturized play presented at the same time as the stage version increases the value of both. Theatrical producers weep over the diminishing receipts from their plays after a film adaptation has been released; yet Mr. Brady tells me that since 'The Pit' was shown in pictures there has been a substantial increase in the royalties from stock company performances. Secondly, I have always maintained that the longer a good film goes the rounds, the more valuable it becomes, and in this belief Mr. Brady concurs."

Mr. Selznick expressed himself as being overjoyed at the manner in which the makers of program pictures are entering the feature field. "Its a great advertisement for our business," he said, "the very best kind of publicity we could get, and really, to show that we are not ungrateful, I think we should pay a part of their operating expenses." In the present tendency toward long subjects, he foresees the early passing of the single reel, save for comedies, and forecasts for the future five-reel features, one-reel comedies and educational and scenic subjects of 500 feet.

The custom of selling film at so much per foot recalls a dry goods store to Mr. Selznick and he looks for the time when all pictures will be marketed in a more suitable manner. The foot measure, he maintains, besides being a poor method of estimating the real value of a picture, tends to lower the standard of production. "In too many studios," he said, "a director is under contract to turn out so many feet of film a week and his expenditures are limited to a certain amount, even if a picture virtually demands a larger investment. The director is forced to economize in little things that may loom large in the completed product. Instead of getting what he knows is correct for a setting, he makes the best of something passable, which he happens to have on hand, and instead of uniform productions we have a conglomeration of makeshifts. We have always avoided the so much per foot idea in World Film pictures. A director is given a scenario to produce and told to go ahead without feeling obliged to keep one eye on the time clock and the other on the expense account. Enough money can be saved by running a business systematically to make possible a liberal expenditure on productions."

KLEINE TO FILM BIG LIST OF POPULAR PLAYS.

Negotiations have been completed between George Kleine and several well known New York playwrights to film a long list of popular plays this year. Fifteen of Owen Davis' comedies and dramas have been acquired, including his "The Sentimental Lady," "An Everyday Man," "The Inheritance," "The Jack of Spades," "When the Shadows Fall," "The Unwelcome Guest," "The Green Cloak," "Cupid and Mr. Jordan," "The Chest of Gold," "Queen of Poverty Flats," "Among the Poor," "The Man Higher Up."

"The best guarantee of a successful picture is a successful play," said Mr. Kleine in discussing his plans. "I have always favored the play as against the novel for picture purposes. Any play that stands the grind of the circuits for several seasons is a sure success in film. It must have plot and heart interest, and is not so dependent as the novel upon language and its author's name. I think we demonstrated that very clearly in 'Du Barry,' 'Officer 666,' and 'Stop Thief.' Each one of those was brimful of action and each had shown its entertaining powers long before it was filmed. Furthermore, a successful play is more widely advertised and better known to the masses than a novel of corresponding merit, which makes it a better drawing card for exhibitors."

A Monument of Push and Efficiency

The Picture Theater Equipment Company, H. T. Edwards, Owner, in Its Splendid New Home on West Twenty-third Street, Ready to Serve the Exhibitor.

IN ITS new splendid and commodious home at 19 West Twenty-third street, New York City, the Picture Theater Equipment Company, of which H. T. Edwards is the owner, may well challenge comparison with the world. Not only is the company well housed, well located and well managed, but it is in the most liberal sense of the word one of the best equipped concerns of its kind to be found anywhere in filmdom. The store makes a fine front on Twenty-third street, conveying the idea of substance and solidity. The show window, spacious and dressed by an expert, draws the passing crowds from sunrise to sunset.

H. T. Edwards, the owner, who is known to all his friends and patrons as the man forever on the job, was visibly pleased with the new home of the Picture Theater Equipment Company when a representative of the Moving Picture World visited him in his new quarters.

"It is a pleasure," he said with a smile of gratification, "to receive exhibitors in these rooms. It is a place where they can make their headquarters while in the city. As to the articles I have here for their use I could not enumerate them all; I simply couldn't."

Mr. Edwards stood just back of the roomy private office alongside of two huge glass cases, each 20 feet long and filled with smaller parts of machines and with supplies generally.

"Here," continued Mr. Edwards, "is every conceivable thing which an exhibitor of motion pictures may have use for outside of the films themselves. You know I sell every type of moving picture machine on the market today; I am not confined to any particular make."

Mr. Edwards then led the visitor through the light and airy rooms (the ceiling is about 24 feet high) of his new headquarters and showed him a bewildering variety of machines, rheostats, screens, frames, ticket choppers, rewinders, parts of machines, chairs, generators, current saving devices and a hundred other things the use and value of which is probably understood by the exhibitor and operator alone. In the rear of the office is the stock and shipping room with every provision for service and efficiency.

The offices were well patronized at the time the visitor called. There were exhibitors from various sections of the country, and all united in saying that they knew of few business institutions in the supply line which could approach the Picture Theater Equipment Company in its ability to serve the exhibitor. The Picture Theater Equipment Company, it may be added as a matter of history, started from rather modest beginnings in a small store on Fourteenth street. Its rapid rise in popularity and efficiency of service are solely the result of the activities of its enterprising owner, H. T. Edwards, "the man who is forever on the job."

EDESON IN VITAGRAPH PICTURE.

The first Vitagraph production in which Robert Edeson will be seen is a picturization of "Mortmain" or "The Dead Hand," from the story of Arthur C. Train. Mr. Edeson, who will portray Mortmain, will have in his support a cast including James Morrison as Forsythe, Donald Hall as Russell, J. Herbert Frank as Doctor Crisp, Edward Elkas as Flaggs, Gladden James as Scalscope, and Muriel Ostriche as Bella. The picture is being directed by Theodore Marsten under the personal supervision of J. Stuart Blackton.

Vitagraph Theater Changes.

"The Chalice of Courage," by Rev. Cyrus Townsend Brady, Heads a Strong Bill.

THE Vitagraph Theater will offer another photographic masterpiece as the feature of the program commencing Sunday, May 2, in a picturization of Rev. Cyrus Townsend Brady's remarkable story, "The Chalice of Courage." Produced in six parts by Rollin S. Sturgeon, with a cast of Western Vitagraph Players, including William Duncan as William Newbold, Myrtle Gonzales as Enid Maitland, George Holt as James Armstrong, and Natalie de Lontan, George Kunkel, William V. Ranous, Otto Lederer and Anne Schaefer portraying familiar characters, "The Chalice of Courage" ranks second to none of the big, contemporary motion picture offerings. The clarified air of the great West, especially in the mountains where the majority of the scenes were taken, with rugged, snow-capped peaks in the background, brings out scenes and characters in bold relief, lending an irresistible charm and attractiveness to the picture. The story is one of appealing human interest and tells of the adventures of an Eastern girl, who becomes snowbound in a cabin in the mountains with a man, self-accused of wife murder, as her only companion. The events leading up to and following this enforced imprisonment and dramatically told while the companionship of the man and maid, make for a happy ending in the pure love of the pair. "The Chalice of Courage" is the strongest, most vital of Mr. Brady's stories, exceeding in dramatic interest, pictorial accuracy and superb enactment, any previous screen drama from his gifted pen.

The shorter pictures of an exceptional program will comprise "The Valley of Humiliation," a dramatic story of a girl's harrowing journey through the Valley of Despair to the extreme of happiness, introducing Eleanor Blevens and Alfred Visburgh in the principal characters. Two comedy pictures, "Dimples, the Auto Salesman," an amusing story in which a woman's will and an automobile lead the way to a minister, in which Lillian Walker and Billy Quirk introduce their distinctive style of comedy, and "Mr. Jarr and the Dachshund," No. 7 of Roy L. McCardell's Famous Jarr Family series, in which the mistaken identity of a dog causes excitement in Harlem, with Harry Davenport and Rose Tapley, and Mr. and Mrs. Jarr respectively, being the comedy subjects.

THOMAS MOORE, WASHINGTON PICTURE MAN, IN TOWN.

Thomas Moore, owner of several picture houses in Washington, among them the Strand, a house seating 2,240 people, 500 more than any other theater in the capital city, is in New York booking some big features like "The Eternal City." He is also trying to straighten out the tangle over Paramount bookings that was noticed in our last issue. Mr. Moore is very friendly with the Paramount people and is most enthusiastic over its product and his order terminating the contract was merely temporary, to lighten expenses during the summer, a measure called for by the fact that heretofore his big theater has been closed during the three hot months. He is dissatisfied solely with the methods of the Paramount's booking agent, George M. Mann, and hopes to get a decision from the head office that will make his going to the courts unnecessary. Mr. Moore says that the statements obtained by the World man from George Mann and published under "Washington Correspondence" last week did not present the facts accurately, particularly as to the agreement for setting the date of the releases of Paramount offerings to him a week later than the nominal date.

FILMS LOST OR STOLEN.

The United Film Service of Chicago writes that, on April 14 a case of films was either lost or stolen from its "pick-up" machine. The case contained these pictures: No. 4093, "Convict's Conspiracy," 3-reels; No. 4012, "Camille as She Never Was," 1 reel; No. 4090, "Such a Picnic and Target Practice," split reel. The trade is requested to keep a lookout for these pictures and to notify the United Film Service, 17 North Wabash street, Chicago.

To Welcome Selig Special.

Tourists to See Real Western Life on Frontier.

Caliente, Nevada, one of the remaining wild and wooly communities reminiscent of the days of Bret Harte, is planning to accord an enthusiastic reception to the Selig Exposition tourists who will pass through that section. Mr. Ryan, a rancher, who possesses thousands of acres of cattle country, has invited all guests aboard the Selig Special to become guests of the town of Caliente and promises to provide cattle, horses and ponies and cowboys for an honest-to-goodness wild Western show and the entire town will cooperate in showing the Selig tourists some real Western frontier atmosphere. The citizens of Caliente held a mass meeting recently and decided to greet the special upon its arrival there.

The citizens of Catario, California, will meet the train with wagon loads of California peaches. The peaches will be presented to the Selig Exposition Special guests.

The citizens of Santa Barbara have signified their intention of meeting the Selig train de luxe with wagons filled with beautiful blooms.

The Studio in a Story.

James Oppenheim Makes "Copy" of the Picture People in His New Book, "The Beloved."

JAMES OPPENHEIM, the author of many books and magazine stories, also quite well known to the lovers of motion pictures as a writer of photoplays, has told something of his knowledge of pictures and the places where they are made in his new story, "The Beloved," published by B. W. Huebsch, New York. The new novel concentrates upon problems of personal relationship.

A New England Sir Galahad enters into the life of a very young person already weary on the primrose path. He is a poet with a family tree and she is a weed about whose roots the less said the better. These two love and they awaken in each other the dormant traits which in him serve to emancipate from the thrall of his ancestry and in her release noble womanhood with work and sacrifice as its means of expression. No longer do her surroundings offer temptation and no longer is he the creature of cramping tradition as personified by his affectionate but narrow mother.

In telling the tale of Ralph and Beatrice the author presents the interesting background in which they live and struggle. Most frequently the setting is that of Greenwich Village and Washington Square, those sections of older New York that the painters and writers of to-day have made their home. Perhaps to our picture-mad world the accounts of the rehearsals in the film studios will prove of liveliest interest. They are reminiscent of Mr. Oppenheim's early short stories in which he so vividly described the mine and the mill. To read this part is like going behind the scenes and becoming acquainted with the actors after the grease paint is washed off.

But alas! there will be tears for the young woman who takes "The Beloved" and a two-pound box of candy among her soft cushions. Ajax Oppenheim defies the modern lightning and refuses to end the story happily. He might have had them marry and move from Washington Square to a flat with hot and cold water on Washington Heights but—he doesn't.

In the manner of its composition "The Beloved" suggests the completeness of an arc. Though not a short story it has its compactness of form, its reserve and power of suggestion. There is something lofty, poetic and estatic inherent in the work. To those who like James Oppenheim this will come as the best thing he has done. As for those who don't like him, probably they will continue not to like him.

Biograph Books Roy Norton Stories.

Famous Short Tales by Several Celebrated American Writers Now in Preparation as Single Reel Dramas.

FOLLOWING up the notable success of the two-reel Biographs, the majority of which have been adapted from the works of great dramatic writers, Biograph Company announces for release, in the near future, a series of single reel dramas based on celebated short stories by Roy Norton, author of "The Vanishing Fleets," and other leading American authors.

The first of the Roy Norton stories to be released is "Gratitude," a powerful tale of Western mining camp life, in which Laughing Jim, the "square" gambler, pays a debt of gratitude. Mr. Norton's work is admirably adapted for the screen, as his stories are peopled by characters which never fail to create sympathy and he is a master of dramatic construction. He is one of three writers who went to the Klondike in the early days and returned to tell the tale, the other two being Jack London and Rex Beach.

Another extraordinary story scheduled for early release by Biograph Company is "The First Piano in Camp," by Sam Davis, a brother of Robert H. Davis, editor of the Munsey magazines. This story created a sensation when it appeared in print. It has one of those unique twists which, arising out of the surprising resourcefulness of human character, made the fame of O. Henry. A heart-stirring interest is created by many deft character touches; then comes the surprise at the finish, one of the most remarkable bits of pure comedy ever devised by a writer familiar with American types. Leading critics have compared it with Mark Twain's famous story, "The Jumping Frog of Calaveras County."

"THE FAILURE"—A TWO-REEL LUBIN.

"The Failure" is the title given a thrilling two-reel drama just finished by Captain Wilbert Melville at the studios of the Lubin Western Company at Los Angeles. The idea itself is unique and Melville has obtained a production that should attract considerable attention.

British Notes

A WEEKLY journal, with a circulation out of all proportion to its intelligence upon matters motographic, is having much to say upon an alleged American attempt to "corner" the market in moving picture rights of famous fiction. A well-known syndicate of the Eastern States is credited with having made a bold attempt to induce some of our leading dramatic and literary lights to sell, upon a royalty basis, absolute rights for the picturization of their most notable works. Certain authors are said to have regarded the idea of rewriting their successes to meet the exigencies of the silent stage with a marked approval, while others were totally opposed to the suggestion.

Recent accounts from the war zone serve to cast illumination upon the way of the moving picture industry in Germany during war time. Compared with America or Great Britain, the lot of the Teutonic exhibitor, even in the piping times of peace, is not a featherbed. Taxation is high and censorship is hard. The severity of the latter upon the "lichtbilder" at the present day is most marked. A former acquaintance of mine who runs his own little "licht spielhaus" (or, to be precise, who did so before the war) stated in a recent letter that his show in Karlsruhe had been taken over as a billeting depot for troops on their way to the field. In the larger neighboring cities of Strassburg and Stuttgart most of the moving picture exhibitions are closed owing to the scarcity of films. This shortcoming is accentuated by the stringency of the censors who require all films to be submitted to them a few weeks in advance of exhibition and who incidentally reject almost as many films as they sanction.

The jack tar aboard the warship is becoming especially keen on moving pictures now that a number of battleships patrolling the coasts have been fitted up by the Admiralty with projecting apparatus. The demand for "Keystones" to mitigate the tedium of the sailors is said to be abnormal. In fact, according to one informant, the only films that are shown are comics, "wild west" dramas and topicals. Similarly is the ubiquitous film to be found within a stone's throw of the trenches. An extract from a soldier's letter received a day or two ago reads: "When the 'Jack Johnsons' began to drop just behind our picture palace we didn't trouble about them but kept on with the performance, singing the 'Robert E. Lee'." This picture palace is the town hall of the village which was the headquarters of the Fourth Division. After their spell in the trenches, the men hasten off to the brewery (now fitted up as a bath house) and then to the picture show, where, thanks to the consideration of a London house in the trade, the most recent releases can be seen daily, just as at home. When the history of the Great War comes to be written, the historian will doubtless devote a chapter to the small but welcome part played by the moving picture.

Sydney M. Baber returned to London last week after his exhaustive tour of the States. He is in excellent health and spirits after his lengthy sojourn in Los Angeles.

J. B. SUTCLIFFE.

CENSORSHIP IN GUATEMALA.

The President of Guatemala has signed a decree providing for a censorship of films brought into the country. All motion pictures must be submitted to the inspection of delegates appointed by the Minister of Government and Justice before their production will be authorized. To obtain admission through the customs or the postoffice the officials in charge will send, through the proper channels, a list of the films and the name of the consignee to the minister named for his decision. The presence of children under 12 years of age at night exhibitions is forbidden, and the films shown at day exhibitions at which children are present, must be suitable to their age. Infractions of this decree are to be punished by a fine and by the confiscation of the films.

COLEMAN LEASES OPERA HOUSE.

R. S. Coleman of Beeville, Texas, has again resumed control of the Vendone Theater, that city. Besides reopening this house he has also taken a long lease on the Grand Opera House also in Beeville. The Vendome will be opened every night, but the opera house will be operated only when Mr. Coleman runs a big feature picture or a road attraction. The past experience which Mr. Coleman has had in the amusement game will constitute a valuable asset.

South African Letter

IT APPEARS, that when Mr. I. W. Sechlinger, the moving spirit of the African Theaters Trust, went to England last year, he called at several places along the coast (South Africa), and bought moving picture halls. Whilst in England he carried through negotiations with Bandman of India, and Rickard of Australia, for the formation of the International Theatrical Booking Agency, a company which has since been registered and started work. Under his inspiration also the African Films Production Company is being formed for the manufacture of South African films, and Lorimer Johnson and an expert producer from the United States have been engaged to take charge of the show. Personally, I think it a step in the right direction, and certainly a director or two from the United States will make things hum.

Crowded houses have been the rule wherever the Cines picture, "The Naked Truth," was shown. A striking feature was the way in which it was advertised. Just a plain white and large lettering on a black background. At night time with the aid of electric lights it caught the eye of the passer-by at once. He stood and looked at it, and ten to one he booked a seat for the next evening's performance.

Although Martin Chuzzlewit has been played here before on the screen, yet a good attendance was the result of the Biograph picturization of Dicken's story.

The acting of Allan Hall was splendid and dignified; many of the women in the audience were heard to remark, "what a clean-cut face; how I admire his curly hair, his masterful manner of acting."

"Sacrifical Fires," a Balboa subject, was well received but it did not appeal to the people so well as "The Price of Crime," a Warners Feature production.

Packed houses were the rule wherever this great picture was shown. The twelve-sheet poster, a masterpiece of the lithographer's art, was enough to draw in the most heartless human being. Special music was the rule, and the result was combined with splendid projection, a perfect picture. Jack Conway, as the bank cashier, portrayed his part in a masterful way.

Dot Farley as his wife, came in for a large share of enthusiastic clapping. As for Mrs. Farley, well there were not a few tear-stained faces at her wonderfully sympathetic acting. Her method in the last picture was a wonderful effort.

But to the male portion of the audience, nothing could beat the dash of the rangers and outlaws. Men rose in their seats with excitement, and many a woman screamed when the clash occurred, and as the last part of the picture died off the screen nearly all exclamations were: "For an open-air, and clean-cut exciting picture, that one will take a long time to be outclassed."

In South Africa, the news that Ford Sterling has rejoined the Keystone was received with thunderous applause. Charles Chaplin is also well known, but everybody says, "What a pity he did not stop on with Keystone," for he and Ford together, well—it is one long laugh.

Francis X. Bushman in the "Masked Wrestler" appealed very largely to the sporting instinct of the audience and in the wrestling bouts he was continually accorded a voluminous hand-clapping.

We have had some of the "Bill" series lately. They are good, but would it not be better to edit the leaders for the particular countries to which it (the picture) is destined to go, for few if any of a South African audience understand Americanisms. And, only an infinitesimal portion of the reading public appreciate American literature. They know not the delight of perusing the work of Cullum, or Stratton-Parker, or John Fox, Jr., and many others too numerous to mention, works that are always clean-cut and with the breath of life between the covers.

Our troops are fighting their way in German South West Africa and it is amusing to read some of their letters home how they miss the moving picture hall. I don't know whether the Germans established any shows in Windhuk (our boys have not got there yet), but I think that if it is so, the show will be well patronized when our men reach there.

After all said and done, what is still wanted is the educating of the public as regards moving pictures. Why do not Universal, and Mutual, not to say the other worthy ones, start and negotiate with the Films Trust? I am sure something could be done, and I feel that everybody would enjoy some weekly publication on motion pictures.

It is up to you Universal, Mutual, and the others, to act at once.

SYDNEY HAROLD CRAWFORD.

A "Famous" Birthday Party.

Edwin S. Porter Tendered Surprise Birthday Dinner by Mrs. Porter.

LAST Wednesday evening E. S. Porter, Producing Manager of the Famous Players Film Co., was tendered a surprise dinner at the Hotel Knickerbocker to commemorate his forty-fifth birthday. The party was carefully planned and organized by Mrs. Porter, the wife of the noted director, and it is interesting to note that though eleven of Mr. Porter's closest associates were invited, the guest of honor did not have the faintest intimation that the dinner had been arranged until his entrance into the dining room—a feature unusual in most surprise parties.

Brought to the Knickerbocker by Adolph Zukor, President of the Famous Players, on the pretext that he was to attend an important business conference, Mr. Porter was fairly stunned when upon his arrival he found the little gathering of friends grouped around the table awaiting his astonished entrance. The effect upon Mr. Porter was further heightened by the fact that as he was crossing the threshold the musicians concealed in a corner began to play Garabaldi's march, the music conspicuous in the score of the orchestral accomanpiment to "The Eternal City," at the Astor Theater. After a moment of dazed embarrassment, Mr. Porter realized the real purport of the "business meeting" to which he had been called, and entered into the "spirit" of the occasion with charming good nature.

A humorous circumstance connected with the affair was that earlier in the afternoon Mr. Porter had told Mr. Zukor that he was reluctant to attend the "conference" that night, as he had promised to take dinner with Mrs. Porter, a habit from which he had never before deviated on his birthdays. Only upon the insistence of Mr. Zukor that the meeting was of the utmost importance did he consent to go, and his emotions were stirred when upon his arrival at the Knickerbocker he saw on the menu, "Surprise Birthday Dinner Tendered to Mr. Edwin S. Porter and His Friends by Mrs. E. S. Porter."

Among those present besides the guest of honor were Adolph Zukor, William H. Swanson, formerly associated with Mr. Porter in the Rex and Universal Companies; B. F. Porter, "the Simplex man" and a brother of the director; Hugh Ford, who collaborated with Mr. Porter on the production of "The Eternal City;" Al Lichtman, who acted as Toastmaster, Frank Meyer, A. Weinberg, Directors James Kirkwood and Sidney Olcott, Ralph Kohn, the Attorney of the Famous Players Film Co., and B. P. Schulberg.

Al. Lichtman opened his address by the statement, "Gentlemen, this is a surprise party," at which Mr. Porter facetiously remarked, "I agree with you."

The addresses consisted of reminiscences and expressions by all present of the esteem and admiration in which Mr. Porter is held by all who are and have been associated with him. Many toasts were drunk to the absent hostess, who must have received as much happiness from the event as those who were present. Mr. Zukor made a stirring address in which he said that throughout his entire business career he had never been associated with a man as lofty in his ideals and as just in his views, as thoroughly lovable in character, as Edwin S. Porter. There was a sincerity in Mr. Zukor's words and voice that brought spontaneous applause from all present.

About the room were posters of "The Eternal City," appropriate legends, and some lithographs of the old Rex pictures which Mr. Porter had produced, one of which entitled "Looking Backward," was particularly significant.

Mr. Porter will no doubt remember the dinner that commemorated his forty-fifth birthday even if he has as many more.

Gala Week For Morosco-Bosworth.

Elsie Janis, Fritzi Scheff, Dustin Farnum and Margaret Edwards in Stellar Roles on Broadway.

THE past week offered a strong representation on New York's important theatrical thoroughfare for Bosworth, Inc., which in association with the Oliver Morosco Photoplay Company is responsible for four big attractions in principal picture houses along the "White Way."

At the Strand Theater, the latest release from the Bosworth, Inc., studios, presenting the well known Dustin Farnum in "Captain Courtesy," a thrilling drama of early California days, has been receiving due appreciation by capacity audiences. Fritzi Scheff, the famous operatic star, in a photoplay version of her recent Broadway success, "Pretty Mrs. Smith," made her New York screen debut at the Broadway Theater, where big business resulted in the presentation of this film, the initial release of the Oliver Morosco Photoplay Company.

"Hypocrites," the wonderful film allegory which is creating a sensation all over the country, has been drawing capacity audiences at every performance at the 81st Street Theater, and last, but by no means the least, Elsie Janis in "The Caprices of Kitty," a delightful comedy which is receiving many rebookings at the present time, has been appearing with big success at the Riverside Theater, an uptown Broadway house. The fact that a Bosworth film has been showing in this character of a house is in itself proof that the releases of the company are in big demand.

This offers a gala Broadway week for the Morosco-Bosworth combination, beginning at 41st Street and extending to upper Broadway. The class of audiences to which these producers cater is readily indicated by the patrons of New York's most palatial motion picture theaters, and the manner in which these photoplays have been received along New York's "White Way" is only a duplication of the way the Morosco-Bosworth product is going all over the country.

CHESTER BARNETT TO PLAY OPPOSITE VIVIAN MARTIN.

Chester Barnett is to play the lead in James Young's forthcoming picture, based on the William A. Brady photoplay production, "Little Miss Brown," in which Vivian Martin is to be starred. This is the third time he has played opposite Miss Martin under the World Film banner, the two previous pictures being "Old Dutch" and "The Wishing Ring." He is a great favorite among the picture fans, his work being especially commendable in "The Pit," in which he supported Wilton Lackaye.

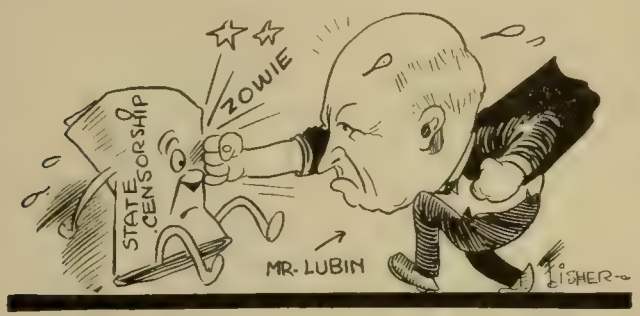
Tom Santschi, the Selig star, says "The way of the film actor is hard." Gee, Tom, it is tough when you have to stand for all the popularity and admiration of the sweet young fans and everything. You're kerrect, Thomas, it's a awful life.



"Pop" Lubin stepped into the ring the other night at Baltimore, rolled up his sleeve and took a smash at state censorship. He landed an awful uppercut on censorship's "beezle" and old "Kid Censor" took a nap on the floor until the referee said "ten." He probably thought the building had fallen on him.

There will be a general exodus of wild animal hunters from Africa if Mr. Selig doesn't lay off grabbing every quadruped that wanders away from his little jungle fireside. Every time an ourang-outang goes out cocoanut collecting or a laughing hyena giggles, a Selig crew shanghais them and frisks them away to California, where in a brief time they learn how to act for the pictures. Many animal wives would grieve their feline hearts away if they but knew that friend husband was playing the animal lead in a Selig drama. Anyway it's a wonderful zoo Mr. Selig has raised out there under California skies.

It is authoritively and unequivocally denied that Charlie Chaplin is going to run for President. Charlie is taking no chances on losing his popularity, by heck!

Here's a tip. Never do a thing the "average way"—you won't get a rise out of a tack. Achieve the best or put over the very worst and either way you'll have them talking about you. If you're the average they won't know you. Which leads to just this. The other day while Griffith's masterpiece, "The Birth of a Nation," was being shown at a New York theater some misguided soul heaved a few eggs at it, but had poor delivery and missed. Several members of the orchestra ducked in time to save themselves from changing their shirts, but the incident served to emphasize the fact that many were opposed to the exhibition of this wonderful film not because it was bad but because it was extraordinarily good it stirred their animosity. But it has attracted attention. Now do you get my point?

Miss. Marinoff in "The Lure of Mammon"

WORK on "The Lure of Mammon," the three-act "Broadway Favorites" production, in which Fania Marinoff is featured, has just been completed. This feature attraction will be released Monday, May 17. Written specially for Miss Marinoff, "The Lure of Mammon" is peculiarly suited to her histrionic ability and enables this talented actress to display the emotional qualities which have won her fame on Broadway in such successes as "A Thousand Years ago," which was presented at the Shubert theater; "Consequences," at the Comedy theater, and in "The House Next Door," Gaiety theater.

Miss Fania Marinoff.

Miss Marinoff enacts the role of Dorinda, the unhappy wife of the brutal Thorston. Among the novel effects introduced in this production is that which shows a steamship burning in midocean. This occurs at night, and the flames, lighting up the waters and revealing the wild panic aboard the doomed vessel, combine to produce an effect that is indescribably weird.

"The Lure of Mammon" is in three acts and, like "An Innocent Sinner," the "Broadway Favorites" feature which preceded it, the production will be released by Kalem Company in regular service.

Reginald B. Lanier, son of F. D. Lanier, of the old established New York banking house of Winslow, Lanier & Company, has succeeded Philip O. Mills as secretary of the Picture Playhouse Film Company, Inc., with offices at No. 71 West 23rd Street. There have been many instances of the use of Wall Street capital in the moving picture business, but this is an unusual instance of where a Wall Street man has turned from stocks, bonds and securities to the personal promotion of photo plays.

Mr. Lanier has been interested in the Picture Playhouse Film Company, Inc., as a stockholder for some time, but as the result of negotiations which were concluded Monday afternoon, April 19th, he has assumed an official position with the big feature company, and in the future will devote all of his time to the Company's interests. Mr. Lanier's purchase of Mr. Mills' stock makes him a big factor in the Company. In addition to acting as secretary of the organization he will have charge of the department of publicity and advertising. Mr. Lanier has also been elected a member of the Board of Directors.

Arbor Theater, Detroit, Mich.

Has One of the Most Beautiful and Unique Entrances—Arbor Effect Ambitiously Carried Out.

THE New Arbor theater, situated at 1319-21 Woodward avenue, Detroit, Mich., facing Harper avenue, has a rather unusual design for its entrance which has received a great deal of favorable comment. As will be noted by the photograph it is an entirely enclosed lobby having for its exterior a latticed glass front with two double door entrances. The box office is situated inside of the lobby between the entrances, and patrons can enter by either door and pass in front of the box office. A clear view of the box office is had through the glass front. Two entrances lead from the lobby to the theater proper, one used exclusively for an entrance and the other for an exit. These entrances are entered through two separate vestibules the walls of which are of glass stained with a grape arbor pattern. The lobby is one story in height only and is situated entirely on the sidewalk. Many have wondered how this could be done but the answer is found in the fact that the building proper is located fifteen feet back from the lot line, so that the lobby while on the sidewalk is inside the lot. The top of the lobby is outlined in tungsten lights, and one large arc light is placed at each side of the lobby. A large electric sign bearing the words "The Arbor Theater" is on top of the lobby where also are two six sheet display boards placed on an angle so as to show from each side. The columns and top of the outside of the lobby are white and gold and the window sash and doors are mahogany; the inside of the lobby is entirely in white and gold with brass lanterns. The arbor effect is carried throughout.

The interior is a light tan trimmed with brown and the fixtures are inverted tan bowls covered with artificial flowers with which the interior is beautifully decorated. The aisles are covered with green cork carpet as are the boxes which are in the rear of the theater. The boxes seat five prsons each and are fitted with mahogany chairs. The interior is very cozy and pretty. The theater seats close to 500 and is equipped with a Masterlite Gold Fibre Screen and Powers' 6a machines. The theater is heated by a steam plant and is well ventilated by a fan system. Performances are given daily in the evening only, starting at 6:45 and running until 10:30 continuously. On Saturdays, Sundays and holidays matinees are given starting at 1.45 with a continuous show until 10:30. Five reels are shown daily for ten cents. Saturdays a special children's matinee is given. A weekly program is issued.

The theater was opened the middle of December last and has been well patronized. Its front is one of the most beautiful and unique on Woodward avenue. A feature is made of the display of paper as its position on the public sidewalk makes it very noticeable and a splendid advertisement. The theater is owned by Alvin D. Hersch, one of the best known of Detroit's attorneys. While this is Mr. Hersch's first venture in the picture field he is well known to the theatrical men of Detroit and Michigan as he has specialized in corporation and particular theatrical law.

Flashes Powerful Searchlight About City—Has Handsome Decorations—Ken E. Finlay, Resident Manager.

SITUATED in a section of Ottawa where a few year ago the construction of a picture house was unheard of, the Imperial Theater now stands, a credit to the owners and to that city at large. The Imperial is under the control of United Motion Pictures Limited, which operates a chain of theaters throughout the United States and Canada. The exterior of the theater is quite attractive, and a strong incentive for business in itself. A novel method of advertising the theater and attracting the attention of the public has been adopted by the management. A large and powerful searchlight has been mounted on the roof and at night this light is flashed up and down the thoroughfare, illuminating various buildings in the neighborhood. This advertising scheme combined with the attractive interior and the high class of program has resulted in capacity houses for this theater.

The building is constructed of steel and reinforced concrete, being practically fireproof throughout. The cantilever system of balcony has been used in the construction, thus eliminating the necessity of pillars, which have for many years been a source of annoyance to audiences and a problem to theatrical men. The general color scheme is a combination of black and gold which harmonizes perfectly with the woodwork which is of polished gumwood. The indirect system of lighting has been utilized. In the upper boxes artistic candelabra are placed. At the rear of the house a luxurious carpet covers the cement floor.

The seating capacity is 1,200, accommodating 500 in the orchestra, with the remaining 700 upstairs, where there is a very handsome women's lounge room. The ground floor is divided into three aisles, one large one in the center with two smaller outside aisles. Part of the ground floor is also divided at about the middle into mezzanine boxes. The side walls are decorated by artistic bas-relief panels. The stage is handsomely appointed, the base being composed of gilt painted steps upon which rest eight columns, producing an effect of Grecian architecture. A Canadian coat of arms, surmounted by the Royal crown, embellishes the arch above the stage. This arch is decorated with plastic relief work. A feature of the Imperial is the system of curtains. A large longitudinal curtain of royal purple has been substituted for the ordinary drop curtain. This curtain folds neatly to each side disclosing a second one of plaited gray satin which covers the screen.

A $20,000 organ, which, by the way, was made in Ottawa, supplies a high class brand of music. The organ is presided over by H. Craig, who is always ready to play request numbers. Ventilators in the ceiling, concealed by ornamented lattice work, provide a constant supply of pure air. As one enters the theater, he is handed a program by a uniformed attendant. The rear doors are all fitted with panic bolts, the Imperial being the only theater in the city which has these safety devices. Through the courtesy of Ken E. Finlay, the popular resident manager, the Imperial theater is being utilized on Sunday evenings by various scientific societies for educational purposes. Undoubtedly, the Imperial lives up to the management's assertion that it is "Canada's Theater Beautiful," and it is safe to say that it is a valuable addition to the Canadian capital, both as an amusement house and as an excellent example of theater architecture.

The New Broadway, Louisville, Ky.

By the Employment of Judicious Business Direction Steurle Bros., as Exhibitors, Have Grown from a $700 Corporation to a $70,000 Company in Seven Years—New Theater Has Big Wurlitzer Orchestrion.

THE completion of the new Broadway theater, erected by the Broadway Theater Company, of Louisville, probably marks a new epoch in the moving picture business of Louisville. The theater is one of the largest and handsomest houses in the city and is complete throughout. It is located at Shelby street and Broadway, and represents an investment of $70,000. The history of the Broadway Theater Company is exceptionally interesting, as it illustrates what can be done in the moving picture business when brains, money and time are properly invested in the industry. During the latter part of 1907, Louis and Joseph Steurle became interested in the moving picture industry and decided to build a small theater on their vacant lot adjoining their big dry goods store. Upon investigating conditions they were told by the few moving picture men of the city at that time that to invest money in a suburban house was sure suicide. During January of 1908 a $700 corporation known as the Broadway Theater Company was formed, of which Louis Steurle became president and his brother, Joseph Steurle, became secretary - treasurer. The same officers control the present company, which is capitalized at $70,000 and is licensed to incur an equal debt limit, if so desired. The first theater was completed on April 12, 1908. In other words, a corporation with property valued at $700, in seven years' time has become a going concern which has a capital stock of $70,000.

Louis Steurle.

The first house had a seating capacity of 300 persons. The front was arranged so that one-half was used as a store room and the other half as a box office and entrance to the theater. A big patronage was experienced from the start, as the theater is located in the center of a big German-American settlement, and these people would go to a neighboring theater whereas they would not go down town to a theater. In 1910 the back wall was torn out and the auditorium extended until the theater accommodated five hundred. In 1911 the entire front of the theater was torn out and a stucco front placed across the entire building and a small balcony erected inside. In 1912 the back wall was again torn out and a stage was put in. At the same time the seating capacity was increased to 650. In the same year a fire occurred which burned out the stage and the rear of the house. The fire happened at 2 o'clock in the morning. At 5 o'clock that morning a gang of carpenters and laborers was at work on the building. A temporary curtain was stretched and the shows went on undisturbed. In 1915 the entire side wall was torn out to make room for the new theater which was being built on the adjoining property. One hundred and fifty seats were removed and a temporary wood partition erected. The moment the new house was completed the shows were changed over to the new theater. In the seven years that the old house was in operation not a single entertainment was missed, although the house was remodeled several times, a fire encountered, and a new theater built.

The Broadway Theater, Louisville, Ky., the First Picture House Opened by Steurle Brothers.

The new Broadway theater covers a lot which is 62 x 150 feet, but the rear of the house is ten feet narrower in order to make room for the exit passages to each side, these passages leading to the alley in the rear. The front of the house is constructed of white pressed brick and cut stone. A large clock is placed on the cornice directly over the main entrance. The entire building is constructed of concrete, steel and brick. All woodwork is of mahogany. The lobby is faced with Rockwood tile and is set off with mahogany woodwork of the doors and a decorative landscape. Two paintings entitled "Romance" and "Courtship" are installed in large panels to the right and left of the main auditorium. To the left of the lobby is located a special women's parlor and to the right is the box office. Directly behind the box office is the main office of the theater. Large poster frames of mahogany are set in the main office and in the women's waiting room. These frames are so arranged that by opening a door on the inside of the theater the posters may be fastened directly against the door which when closed makes the poster background. Glass covers the front of the case and no dirt or bad weather can reach the posters. In the women's room the mahogany door is set with a large mirror and no one would ever imagine that the posters were behind the mirror.

Joseph Steurle.

The lobby is 18 feet 6 inches deep and 31 feet wide. The inner doors of the lobby lead directly into the main auditorium, which is 104 feet in length and seats 900 persons. Wide stairways at the front of the house lead to the second floor, or balcony, which is of solid concrete and steel. The balcony is swung on cantilever steel beams. Wide concrete steps lead up through the balcony, which contains nine boxes and three special divisions in which the seats are fifteen cents. The balance of the balcony and the entire first floor sell at ten cents a seat. At the rear of the balcony is the concrete operator's room, which is equipped with two Power's 6A machines. The throw to the screen is a fraction over 97 feet. The machines are both motor-driven, and a motor rewind is part of the equipment. Three portholes are used, two for the machines, and one for the spotlight. Ventilators through the roof carry off the heat and two windows directly under the cornice at the top of the room, which is directly under the roof, give the operators fresh air. A special telephone circuit connects the operating room, the box office, manager's office and stage. A large switchboard is placed in the operator's room which gives him control of the ceiling, side and practically the entire lighting equipment of the house. Toilet rooms have been arranged on each floor. On the lower floor the men's toilet room is located in the front basement, where the blower and special ventilating machinery is placed. Manager George Steurle said that there is not a single one of the 1,325 seats from which it is not possible to hear plainly and see everything that goes on, either on the stage or the screen.

The first floor slopes from the opening from the lobby into the auditorium to the musicians' stall, 7 feet 6 inches, which makes it possible to see with no trouble from all the seats. The entire interior of the theater is decorated in old rose, ivory and gold. The lighting system is of the indirect type and all lights are controlled by dimmers. Eight large lights are in the ceiling of the auditorium and two smaller ones. Six small lights are hung underneath the balcony and five small side lights are placed along each side of the ground floor of the auditorium. A total of eighteen ventilators are placed in the roof, two of which are equipped with exhaust fans, and twelve cornice windows have been installed. The seats are arranged in three long rows with four aisles, two at the center and one at each side. Eleven exits are provided, four at the front, two at each side, one large double exit at the rear of the stage, and one at each side of the balcony, all except the front exits leading to the alleyway.

The stage has a twenty-five foot opening into the auditorium and is equipped so that the theater may be used for vaudeville as well as moving pictures. The stage is twenty feet deep from the curtain to the back wall, which allows room for first-class stage settings. The footlights are placed at intervals of six inches across the entire front of the stage in a regular gutter. Underneath the stage is four dressing rooms, each equipped with a washstand, and one special toilet has been installed for use of the actors. The entire heating throughout the house is handled by means of radiators, which are fastened to the side of the walls at a reasonable height from the floor. Six 1,000 watt nitrogen lights are placed across the front of the building and make it one of the brightest spots on Broadway at night. The inner doors of the lobby are all equipped with large mirrors.

A portion of the equipment of the new theater consists of one of the large Wurlitzer-Hope-Jones Unit Orchestras. This instrument has been located in specially prepared cement chambers on either side of the theater, where upper boxes are supposed to be located. These chambers are directly behind the "blind" boxes and are covered over with grills and light curtains through which the tones find their way to the large auditorium. About two hundred miles of electric wire is used in making the various connections which give the musician or operator control over the instrument. The smallest organ pipe employed in the construction of the instrument is but three-quarters of an inch long and is of the diameter of a straw. The largest pipe is sixteen feet in length and measures some eleven inches in diameter. Wurlitzer orchestras have also been in the Alamo and Walnut theatres, which are under the same management.

In addition to being at the head of the Broadway Theater Company, Louis Steurle is president and Joseph Steurle is secretary of the Broadway Theater Enterprise Company, which handles the bookings and outlines the policy for eight theaters in Louisville which are controlled by the Steurle interests, and are active members in the Louisville Photo-Play Association, and the Kentucky Motion Picture Exhibitors' League. The principal theaters controlled by the Steurle Brothers are: The new Broadway, seating 1,325 persons; The Alamo, owned by the Fourth Street Amusement Company, seating about 1,000; the West Broadway, at eighteenth and Broadway; The Ideal theater, at Twenty-third and Market streets, which seats 1,200; The Baxter theater, on the Bardstown road; the Crown theater, at Seventh and Oak streets, and the Walnut theater, at Fourth and Walnut streets which was originally built for regular productions, but did not pay as a legitimate house. When the Steurle interests took over this theater they started showing high-class productions and charged twenty-five cents a seat, but afterward reduced the price to five cents when the summer came on, and have never raised the price since that time. The old Broadway theater, which has outlived its usefulness, is to be torn down and a airdome will be built on the ground. This airdome, when completed, will have a seating capacity of about 900 and the new divan seat will be used.

Kathryn Durkin.

"LEAVE it to the Irish," says little Kathryn Emmeline Durkin, "to try a little bit of everything, and then sit down and decide coolly, yet judiciously, as to which one of the many things he or she likes best. And that's exactly what this 'Irishman' is doing now."

It was part of a letter the 19-year-old actress wrote to an old friend back home. For be it known that this demure little 100-pound Kansas City girl recently played leading parts in Kriterion films in New Jersey.

Kathryn Durkin.

Miss Durkin can't remember the time when people were not continually urging her to get into moving pictures. Her friends and film men said that that was where she should be. And so for the present she has placed aside her pretty singing and dancing act which graced the Orpheum vaudeville circuit this season and is "doing picture stuff" just for the fun and change, she says. Miss Durkin is a Kansas City production and like several other of the talented artists who have been produced here, lately forsook the stage for the pictures. She says that she believes that she likes this better than acting on the vaudeville circuits, but as she says, "I am an Irishman and a woman, and I am likely to change my mind any time. However, I do not think that it will be very soon." Miss Durkin has done almost a remarkable thing, stepping directly from a vaudeville circuit to the leading roles in moving pictures, and already she has been told that still greater things are ahead for her in that line if she continues in it. And she says, "I am here to stick."

Foreign Motion Picture Fields.

Consuls' Reports Show American Made Pictures Are Favorably Received—Advise Opening American Agency in Mexico—Tokio Theaters Change Program Three Times a Month—Bangkok, with 540,679 Population, Has But Three Picture Houses—Picture Theater Trust in South Africa.

MEXICO.

By Vice Consul A. Gordon Brown, Mazatlan.

MOTION pictures are very popular with the residents of Mazatlan, who will go to see the pictures if they have to deny themselves of some actual necessities. The theaters open at 9 p. m. and the performance is never over until 10.45 p. m., and sometimes lasts until 12.30 a. m. The admission for the shorter performances is 20, 40, and 60 centavos (equivalent, under normal conditions, to 10, 20, and 30 cents United States currency); for the photoplays that last three hours the charge is raised about 65 per cent.

There are three theaters at Matzatlan: The Hidalgo, which has a seating capacity of 1,100 persons and is owned by Luis Damy; the Tivoli, which has a seating capacity of 1,200 persons and is leased by Francisco Peñ y Herrera; and the Rubio, which has a seating capacity of 1,600 persons and is owned by Victor Patron. The first two are rudely constructed in the interior, having hard wooden seats and poor accommodations, but the Rubio is a very good theater for this city, having all the modern conveniences. The first two obtain their power from the local electric-light plant and have alternating currents; the Rubio has its own electric plant and a direct current.

An Agency in Mexico Advisable.

There are several firms that furnish films for this city, among the companies being Cia. Explotadora Cinematografia, a French agency in Mexico City; the Universal Film Manufacturing Co., the General Film Co., the Imperial and the Rex. The most successful of these so far has been the French company, which has, as stated, an agency in Mexico City, and always keeps a large stock on hand, supplying all Mexico with its products. Any American firm desiring to enter this field would do well to establish an agency in Mexico.

All films are rented. Prices average $30 Mexican per night for approximately 2,000 meters (6,560 feet). For the longer films, for which a higher admission charge is made, the theaters pays an aditional percentage on the regular rent of the film, this sometimes running as high as 40 per cent extra.

Sentimental, comic, and chase scenes are very popular. The weekly reviews of the world's happenings are well liked. It is a frequent occurence here for the audience to become much excited when the bandit or criminal apparently is getting the best of the affair. They act as they would if the scene were taking place in real life, and when the criminal is finally caught the spectators show their delight by applauding heartily. Instructive views are also popular, but sad affairs do not seem to take well. A most essential feature is to have the titles written in good Spanish. The average play is about four reels, three reels also being very popular in some theaters.

By Consul William W. Canada, Vera Cruz.

Motion picture shows are one of the principal diversions in the Vera Cruz consular district and on many nights constitute the only amusement for a majority of the people. It is customary to divide an evening performance into four or more parts or shows, an entrance charge of 20 to 30 centavos (about 10 to 15 cents United States currency ordinarily, but less now) being collected for each part, with a reduction on tickets for two or more shows. Each show consists of motion pictures and vaudeville, equal stress being laid upon the two forms of attraction. When a long artistic film is shown a single entrance charge of 1 peso (ordinarily equivalent to about 50 cents American currency) is made, but the usual vaudeville is given as a kind of long interact.

Romantic feature dramas of several reels are the most popular. Emotional scenes of Latin countries are understood the best; hence French and Italian films are much in demand. Sensational Danish and American pictures, however, are also shown with some frequency, but the less exciting plays of the life in northern countries are not appreciated. Long art films of historical interest are greatly esteemed and may be shown to large audiences several nights in succession. Short films, particularly those of a comic character, are regularly shown at the first and last shows.

Rental System in Vogue.

It has never been the custom for the theaters to purchase films, as it is easy to rent them from exchanges in the Republic, especially those in Mexico City. The short films are rented at an average price of 40 pesos a day, while the rental price of art films of several reels varies from 100 to 500 pesos.

Motion-picture shows are given in the larger theaters originally constructed for dramas or operas, but each town has also one or more theaters for vaudeville and motion pictures only. In the interior towns the picture theaters are of small size, but in Vera Cruz the only motion-picture theater giving regular shows at present is a large wooden structure that can seat about 2,000 and has an average audience of 1,600 persons.

JAPAN.

By Consul General George H. Scidmore, Yokohama.

Films are first exhibited at theaters in Tokio; a few, however, are imported by foreign patrons, and then sold to Japanese dealers. From six to twelve reels are exhibited at each show. Entertainments are given every afternoon and evening; programs are changed three times a month. Films are subject to police inspection and supervision. Scenes depicting tragic robbery or immodest love scenes are not permitted. The most popular films are dramatic (Japanese), comic, and scenic.

The monthly rental of films for an entire performance, with three changes, ranges from $200 to $250. New films are sold for about 10 cents per foot, second-hand films not being extensively dealt in. American films are favorably received. The import duty is 40 per cent ad valorem. There are no trade papers here devoted to the cinematograph business. Motion pictures have been introduced into the public schools only to a very limited extent.

SIAM.

By Vice Consul General Carl C. Hansen, Bangkok.

The three picture theaters operating in Bangkok constitute about the only places of amusement for the people of this city of 540,679 inhabitants, and therefore they are well patronized and on a paying basis. The total seating capacity of these three theaters is about 7,000. The show lasts from 8 to 11 p. m., during which time 4,000 to 13,000 feet of film are shown. There is one entertainment on week days and two on Sundays, and the films are usually changed twice weekly.

The Bangkok picture theaters both rent and buy new films through London firms and from the Pathé Freres branch agency in Singapore. The price paid for rental varies from $170 to $284 per month for 50 to 100 reels, the reels being changed twice monthly. New films are bought at 8 cents per foot, second-hand at 1 cent to 5 cents per foot. The most popular films are comic, tragic, historical, industrial, war, chases with amusing falls, Indian, cowboy, and dramatic. The reading should be in English, or, if possible, in Siamese.

Up to the present time motion pictures have not been introduced into the Siamese public schools or other educational institutions. No films are manufactured in Siam, and there are no retail agencies. Motion-picture trade papers are not published in this country.

EGYPT.

By Vice Consul S. Pinkney Tuck, Jr., Alexandria.

Motion pictures are extremely popular in Alexandria. The halls and theaters are a common meeting ground for all the colonies of different nationalities that go to make up the very cosmopolitan population. There are five motion picture theaters in this city. They are the Cinema Iris, with a seating capacity of 1,000; the Theater Moderne, seating 1,400; the Cinema Chantecler, seating 1,250; The American Cosmograph, seating 1,600, and the Cinema Abbas, seating 3,000. All entertainments begin about 6 p. m. and the last show is given at 9.30 p. m. All of the houses are lighted by electricity.

The most popular films are the comic, war, love, slapstick comedy, Indian, and cowboy; the language used in the titles is always French. The Theater Moderne is under the management of the Société Anonyme d'Entreprises Cinematographiques at Sofia, Bulgaria, while the Chantecler is managed by Pathé. The price paid for rental per weekly program of films from Europe varies from $200 to $300. The duty on same amounts to 8½ per cent ad valorem. Motion pictures have not played any part in educational institutions in Egypt, although it is believed the Government is contemplating introducing industrial films shortly, as an experiment, in several of the larger schools.

SOUTH AFRICA.

By Consul Edwin N. Gunsaulus, Johannesburg.

The moving-picture show is a very popular form of entertainment in all the populous centers of South Africa, and is established in every town in this consular district large enough to support one. With the exception of about seven very small houses which show "junk" films, all houses are supplied by the African Film Trust (Ltd), whose associate company, the African Theaters Trust (Ltd.), owns all principal picture houses in South Africa. The separately owned theaters are under film contracts from two to five years and are mainly supplied by the African Films Trust.

Kinds of Film in Use.

All makes and kinds of films are in use in this consular district. The kinds most popular are comic, tragic, war, love, slapstick comedy, manners and customs, chases with amusing falls, spectacular, Indian, cowboy, and educational, the bulk of which are imported from America. At least one or two of these pictures are shown at every show.

Length of Program—Picture Theater Trust.

The picture shows in this city give two programs nightly and matinees on Wednesdays and Saturdays, the first commencing at 7 p. m. and the last at 9 p. m. In the suburbs one long show is given nightly, also the usual matinees. At each entertainment 4,000 to 5,000 feet of films are shown, electric appliances being installed in almost all theaters. The average seating accommodation of motion picture houses in central locations ranges from 400 to 1,500, while in country districts the seating capacity is 200 to 300.

During the last twelve to eighteen months all the leading picture theaters have amalgamated and are controlled by the African Theaters Trust (Ltd.), whose headquarters are Johannesburg. This company imports films on a very large scale for the theaters under its control, at 8 cents per foot for new films and 2 cents per foot for secondhand films, the duty being $1.22 per 100 feet. The separately owned theaters that are at present not under film contracts can not be considered to be of any real importance, as they obtain their films of a very small firm at a weekly rental of $122.

Motion pictures have not been introduced into public schools, but it is customary for educational authorities to make arrangements with the African Films Trust by which special educational matinees are held in the different leading theaters. There is only one trade paper in this city, the African Film News, published by the African Films Trust.

ROBERT T. THORNBY WITH KNICKERBOCKER STAR FEATURES.

Mr. Robert T. Thornby, the director of the Knickerbocker Star Features, at their studios in Flushing, is proving himself equal to the task of organizing and perfecting a new three-reel feature company. A new stage has been erected, making it possible to place a dozen or more sets at the same time, and other improvements are being made to meet the demands of the new company.

Mr. Thornby comes to the Knickerbocker studios with the recommendation of many dramatic successes, having been the director of all the Sterling Kid Comedies and a successful Vitagraph director producing such dramas as "The Passing of Joe Merry," "Daddy's Soldier Boy," "The Outlaw," and others.

A strong feature of Mr. Thornby's work is his mastery of photography and genius in getting perfect light effects. His work in directing is characterized by smoothness and ability to get just what he wants from the actors.

Considering the present outlook, Knickerbocker Star Features promise the General Film program some of the strongest three-reel features that have been offered to the public.

INTERESTING CAST IN "PROHIBITION."

Thurlow Bergen, the popular dramatic star, makes his first bow as a star in a feature film called "Prohibition," being released by the Prohibition Film Corporation at No. 220 West 42nd street, New York. Bergen, although he had previously done a little screen work for Pathe Freres between engagements, has been too busy with Broadway plays to allow him to devote the time necessary for a master film production.

Supporting him in the cast are David Wall, who needs no identification; Charles Dow Clark, who played importantly in "Hello Broadway" and has long been identified with William Collier productions; Charles Trowbridge, leading juvenile in "Daddy Long Legs;" Mary Moore, sister of Owen, Tom and Matt Moore, and sister-in-law to Alice Joyce and Mary Pickford; Virginia Westbrook, who long played leads with Reliance; Roberta Paine, whose physical and spiritual appearance admirably qualified her for the part of the Angel of Prohibition, was selected from swarms of applicants. Through her work as an artist model her face is widely known, having adorned many magazine covers.

CHILD EMOTIONAL ACTRESS.

Little Claire Gamble, the six year old daughter of Fred Gamble, comedy star of the Beauty Company at the American Studios, is destined to become a famous screen star. An exceedingly tempermental, responsive child, she has introduced a deep heart interest in many of the pictures produced at this well known studio. In "The Altar of Ambition," a two part political drama by the second "Flying A" company, this child actress plays an emotional part which will make a strong appeal to picture lovers.

FIRST V. L. S. E. FEATURES SCORE HITS.

Lubin's offering, "The Eagle's Nest," with Edwin Arden and Romaine Fielding and the Vitagraph presentation, "The Juggernaut," with Anita Stewart and Earle Williams, the two superior feature production so far released in the new V. L. S. E. service, have met with the instantaneous success predicted by the critics who reviewed these remarkable features, previous to their release.

PENNANT CRAZE HITS COAST.

The demand for felt pennants in San Francisco was never stronger than at the preset time and several moving picture houses have adopted schemes for increasing patronage by giving these away as premiums. Davis Brothers Poster Exchange has had a large number of twelve by thirty inch pennants made up showing Charles Chaplin, Roscoe Arbuckle and Chester Conklin and finds a big call for these at $1.75 a dozen. The Pastime on Haight Street gives away twenty of these each week to holders of successful numbers on the coupons of tickets sold during the week. Mr. Jorgenson, the owner, reports that the plan has resulted in an increased business, with packed houses on Thursday, when the pennants are distributed.

Notes of the Trade

THE FLORIDA Theatrical Exchange and Motion Picture Producing Co. of St. James Building, Jacksonville, Florida, released, on April 16, "Ashur in Search of a Secretary," the first of a series of multiple reel dramas to be put on under the brand of "Hamilton Pictures."

On his boat trip to and from San Diego, R. A. Walsh will direct the taking of scenes for the one reel Mutual drama, "The Smuggler," as well as for "The Come Back," a longer play. Walsh is rapidly coming to the fore as a producer.

L. W. Adler, who has been salesman at the Pittsburgh office, of the World Film Corporation, has been transferred to the New York branch, in the same capacity.

In Owosso, Mich., the Temple Theater arranged to show Beatriz Michelena in "Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch" in conjunction with the Baptist Sunday School. The school sold tickets for the entertainment and received a certain percentage of the gross sales.

Sydney Ayres, director of and leading man with the Big U company of Universal players, is staging a one-reel story entitled "The Flower Girl." The story comes from the pen of M. R. MacKinstry and was written especially for the needs of Mr. Ayres' company. Mr. Ayres, Doris Pawn and Val Paul play the leading roles.

John Emerson, author of "Conspiracy" and a well known actor on the legitimate stage, is at present appearing in a Mutual Masterpicture which is in the course of production. Mr. Emerson finds that he likes motion pictures so well that he is studying to qualify as a director and will probably ally himself permanently with the new art.

Still larger additions to the dressing room accommodations on the Mutual studio lot at Hollywood are being built. New actors and actresses are constantly being added to the stock company and this necessitates an almost continuous increase in the facilities for housing them.

A commercial department has been inaugurated in the Chicago office of the World Film Corporation, of which Paul Meltzer will henceforth handle this department. Judging from the start he has already made, this venture promises to be a success. Mr. Meltzer is another graduate from the shipping room, on the policy outlined by the World Film Corporation, Chicago office, of promoting its employees wherever possible.

Hobart Bosworth is still working on his first big feature, "Fatherhood" which he himself wrote for the use of his company. The Bosworth company has just returned from a ten days' stay on the Whitewater Ranch at the edge of the Salton Sink where many of the exteriors were staged.

Pathe "Who Pays?" Series.

"The Pursuit of Pleasure" and "Unto Herself Alone," the First Two Instalments, Shown Before an Invited Audience.

Reviewed by Edward Weitzel.

THURSDAY morning, April 22, the Broadway theater, New York City, held an audience consisting largely of educators, clergymen and persons interested in the betterment of social and moral conditions. Two instalments of the Pathe "Who Pays?" Series were then shown, and every one present was asked to hand in a signed expression of opinion in regard to the moral and educational value of the pictures.

Scene from "Who Pays?" (Pathe).

The series, which is to consist of twelve three-part plays, is avowedly a determined advance into the ranks of "the drama with a purpose." Each of the twelve numbers will deal frankly and fearlessly with some ethical or sociologic question, the entire series being intended not only to interest, but to instruct. With this purpose in mind, one important fact has not been lost sight of: that the first duty of a photoplay is to entertain. "The Pursuit of Pleasure" and "Unto Herself Alone," the two dramas exhibited, are striking examples of how thoroughly the producers have appreciated this inexorable law. Ruth Roland will be featured with Henry King throughout the series, Balboa making the films.

"The Pursuit of Pleasure."

The leading characters in "The Pursuit of Pleasure" number but three persons: a narrow-minded, Puritanical and strong-willed clergyman; his pleasure-loving but also strong-willed daughter, and the gay young society man with whom the girl elopes. Marriage opens the door to the worldly delights which her father had always denied her, and Rita and her husband indulge themselves to the full. The underlying motif of the plot is the young wife's reluctance to be burdened with children, even after she knows this is her husband's one great wish. She is brought to realize her mistake by the confidence and affection of a little child, the daughter of a servant; but, just at the moment when she whispers this to her overjoyed husband, a sudden fall deprives her forever of all hopes of maternity.

Aside from unnecessarily accentuating the clergyman's bigotry and prolonging his physical attack upon his son-in-law, this story is worked out with rare judgment, unfaltering interest and in keeping with its didactic intent. The excellent acting of the cast is, of course, a powerful factor in achieving this result. Ruth Roland plays the minister's daughter with sincerity, charm of person, and perfect command of a very human young woman's moods and impulses. Henry King is equally successful as the husband, and Daniel Gilfether is an earnest, dignified, if somewhat too caloric, Rev. Cyrus Deane.

"Unto Herself Alone.

The price a woman pays for defying conventionality is printed in bold figures upon scene after scene of "Unto Herself Alone." A headstrong young girl, accustomed to every luxury, disobeys her mother, and visits, unchaperoned, a party of gentlemen on board a yacht. Later, she passes the night on the same vessel with the owner, only to discover that her seducer is a married man.

Up to this point, the theme is handled with truth, restraint and convincing skill; but inspired, evidently, with a desire to land the much-exalted dramatic "punch," the last third of the photoplay has been permitted to degenerate into sheer melodrama, the man going hopelessly insane from remorse, and fear of his victim, who follows him relentlessly and haunts him with her fixed and accusing eyes. Melodrama is a thing of the emotions, not of the reasoning faculties, and cannot be lifted into the higher walks of the drama, where a serious theme demands earnest and consistent treatment.

Ruth Roland and Henry King, in "Unto Herself Alone," again demonstrate the wisdom of their choice, by giving the drama the benefit of adequate acting. Both plays have every advantage to be derived from perfect photography, and correct accessories for the different scenes. They also contain lessons for parents, as well as for self-indulgent young men and recalcitrant young girls.

"A Sister's Burden."

Alice Hollister Has a New and Attractive Role in a Two-Part Kalem Offering.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

THIS picture is filled with sincerely pictured, homely human feeling. It is a believable story of characters and fates. Its emotions ring true and find a sure response in the spectator's observation and experience. It is a love story and a romance, but such a romance as human beings really taste. It can be shown to any kind of audience; for while the love story and heroism of its central character is followed through the years among the real thorns and the real roses of actual life, there is no crime in it, no infidelity, and the sorrows of its characters are only such as the spectators themselves, in their normal lives, may have and in part must have felt.

The heroine (the sister who bore her burden humanly) is introduced to us as a young girl with her lover. She is motherless and there are two younger children. Her father is crusty, and rudely orders off her beau. She starts to elope with him, but the memory of the children and her duty to them stops her in time. The detail and the acting all through the changing situation reflect great credit on both producer (Robert Vignola) and his players, especially Alice Hollister, as the heroine, and Anna Nillsen—the latter coming into the story later as the slattern wife of the girl's brother. After the broken elopement, about twenty years pass. The heroine's little sister (Mary Kennedy plays the role charmingly) has married. Alice is living with her brother, who drinks and whose wife is a lazy, novel-reading, selfish woman, drawn by Miss Nillson very strongly. Alice tends the baby, cooks and keeps the home half home-like. She takes a holiday at the home of her happily married sister and meets her old lover (Harry Millarde)—her sister's boarder. The contasts and similarities in this group of scenes are especially rich in humanity and feeling—they are beautifully acted and make the picture an unusually attractive offering to the public. The picture has no mechanical drawbacks. The story stands up as a whole and it is an offering that a critic can take pleasure in heartily commending.

Scene from "A Sister's Burden" (Kalem).

Alliance Buffalo Manager in New York.

"The Wrong Woman."

Three-Reel Adaptation of the Play by Fawcett Lamox.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

BASED on the usurpation of social place in English society by a woman employed as a nurse in an India Sanatorium, "The Wrong Woman" presents some new and attractive features of a plot and situation first made of strong interest by Wilkie Collins. The nurse is engaged to Arthur Dane, son of the man who owns the sanatorium, but Arthur throws her over to wed a young girl who is the niece and prospective heiress of Sir Marcus Richardson. Interest in the story during the period of preparation is largely maintained through effective characterization. Marion, the nurse, as interpreted by Mabelle Trunelle, is an admirable piece of work, and Ivy, impersonated by Gladys Hulette, is equally strong, though in marked contrast. These two, with Dane, sail for England, and the young wife discovers aboard ship that her husband is without semblance of honor or conscience.

All three find themselves on a raft in midocean after their ship is wrecked and burned, and they finally reach a deserted island. Dane and the nurse are taken off by a passing vessel, while Ivy is left behind, supposedly dead, though the husband knows that she still breathes. He and the nurse reach England and the latter impersonates Ivy at the magnificent home of Sir Marcus Richardson. Ivy revives, finds food amid some wreckage and manages to survive, though her mind becomes affected by her isolation. Now enters a new factor, a young gentleman interested in the study of fossil remains, who plans to visit the deserted island in pursuit of his favorite branch of biology, Allen by name, Augustus Phillips in reality.

Allen visits the desert island and discovers a wild girl there. He pursues her to her cave, and the scenes on the island are not only highly creditable to Director Ridgely's fine selective taste but are made attractive by Miss Hulette's delightful impersonation. The wild girl is taken back to England, and there a series of dramatic incidents, resulting in the death of Ivy's husband, restores the wronged girl to her own and the wrong woman to a better place than she could have otherwise occupied, for she has endeared her new-found friends and developed in character under superior surroundings. The story bristles with difficulties of visualization, but Ridgely has overcome most of them, and the fine cast is a great factor in the play's success.

"The High Road."

A Five-Reel Screen Version of Edward Sheldon's Drama by the B. A. Rolfe Photo-Play Co.

Reviewed by Edward Weitzel.

DAVID BELASCO is responsible for quite a number of innovations in the producing of plays; among other things, the symbolic opening; for example: the panorama which precedes the first act of "The Girl of the Golden West." This method of assisting an audience into the atmosphere of the impending performance has been adopted by the moving picture producers, very often to the advantage of the photoplay. When skillfully used, it is its own justification. John W. Noble, who transferred the Sheldon drama, "The High Road," to the film, has introduced a number of symbolic scenes at the opening upon one-half of the screen, while, upon the other half, the figure of a woman is shown trampling along a high road into the distance. The result is not altogether artistic and adds nothing to the picture, as the rest of the photoplay is unadulterated melodrama and entirely devoid of the symbolism with which Edward Sheldon tried to envelope the original work. Once past these aids to the unimaginative, what follows is a straightforward and absorbing history of a woman's winning fight against fate.

Not an unusual theme, but, in this case, it has been developed with steadfast purpose and made to yield a constant stream of dramatic but consistently human incidents; a skillfully devised and realistically photographed fire episode forming one of the features of the drama. Uniformly good work on the part of the producer is found all through the play proper.

Valli Valli, the English actress, who first came to this country with "Veronique" and who has other pleasantly-remembered achievements in musical comedy to her credit, plays the role in the screen version of "The High Road" that Mrs. Fiske created in the spoken drama. Her debut in this branch of the actor's art was entirely successful. Frank Elliot and C. H. Brenon contribute well-drawn character studies, and the entire cast has been selected judiciously.

Cornell Men See Finish of "Clutching Hand."

The Whartons, Pathe producers, tell an interesting little story to illustrate the great popularity of "The Exploits of Elaine." The Ithaca theaters showing the serial have been receiving a large patronage from the Cornell students who have followed the fortunes of the fair "Elaine" with marked devotion. It so happened that the fourteenth episode showing the detection of the identity of the "Clutching Hand" was exhibited in Ithaca while the college men were away on their Spring vacation. Immediately on their return they petitioned the exhibitors to book the episode again that they might see it. The request was granted and practically the whole university saw Sheldon Lewis' great work when as "Perry Bennett' he saw his game was up.

Geo. Barr McCutcheon's Novel Done in Films by Essanay, With Francis X. Bushman, Beverly Bayne and Bryant Washburn in the Strong Cast.

the V. L. S. E., Inc., combination. After viewing the subject I am convinced that it well merits the distinction.

The filmed story follows the book closely, and the numerous scenes required in its makeup have been most painstakingly supervised by Director Wright. A close analysis will reveal that the production required infinite care and constant attention to detail, in order to keep the spectator in close touch with the thread of the narrative.

In the first two parts the scenes are laid in America, the opening ones in Denver and the others in Washington, D. C., and New York City. In the beginning of the third part we catch a glimpse of Paris, in a cafe, and after that the action is confined to the principality of Graustark, supposed to be somewhere in the Balkan region. The scene showing the race of a big Concord coach to catch a train from Denver to the East, which has left behind two of its passengers at one of the mountain stations, was taken out in California under the supervision of G. M. Anderson, and the scenes in Washington and New York were negatived in those cities under Mr. Wright's direction. These incidents are mentioned merely to accentuate the pains taken to secure the proper atmosphere.

The first two parts treat of the mutual attachment between a foreign prince and a wealthy young American in a light vein, she under an assumed name, that is harsh to the ear and almost impossible to pronounce. The following four parts have to do with love menaced on all sides by difficulties and tragedies. Throughout, the interest of the spectator never lags. The story holds him fast until the close; and then it brings the pleasure of a happy ending that sends him or her away rejoicing that life is not all disappointment.

The direction is also to be complimented on the success secured in giving the atmosphere surrounding Graustark a foreign tinge. Exteriors and interiors, as well as the costumes used by the people in the cast, combine to create this impression.

Liberal praise must be given the actors and actresses in the cast. As closely as I could judge there was not a single jarring note to disturb the harmony and pleasure created by intelligent, artistic acting. Francis X. Bushman is in his best form as Grenfall Lorry, the young American millionaire; and so it Beverly Bayne as Princess Yetive (incognito, Miss Guggenslocker). Indeed, I have never before seen Miss Bayne to such fine advantage as in this character. She sustains the spirit and dignity of the Princess in commanding form, and yet she has the melting tenderness of a devoted maiden for the man she loves. In the semi-heroic role of Lorry, Mr. Bushman always succeeds in holding chief attention. As lover or hero one follows him with unvarying interest, whether in victory or defeat.

The fine character part of Caspar, uncle of Princess Yetive, has been allotted Thos. Commerford, and no better selection could have been made. His dressing and impersonation of that character are worthy of all praise. Edna Mayo appears as the Countess Dagmar with distinction, and Helen Dunbar furnishes an excellent characterization in the part of Aunt Yvonne. Bryant Washurn, Albert Roscoe, Lester Cuneo and Ernest Maupain form a talented quartet of actors in the respective roles of Prince Lorenz. Harry Anguish, Prince Gabriel and Prince Bolaroz. Harry Anguish, as the friend of Lorry, affords several opportunities for the display of Mr. Roscoe's histrionic ability, and he is always equal to the occasion. The scene showing Anguish browbeating Baron Dangloss, chief of police, of Graustark, and his assistants, after Yorry has been carried off to prison on the trumped up charge of murder, is very spirited. Prince Gabriel is another strong character of the villainous type, and Lester Cuneo realizes fully the possibilities.

The release date was Monday, April 26.

"A Child of God."

A Four-Reel Mutual Masterpicture by Cyrus Townsend Brady.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

DEALING with the attractive character of a rancher who is really a child of nature, "A Child of God" is on the right lines, and the characterization of the rancher is exceptionally fine. He is a wild creature, impersonated by Samdo Grasse, and he is so recognized by the refined little school teacher interpreted by Francellia Billington. He represents one of the primitive forces in the development of society. The immediate gratification of his desires is the mainspring of his conduct, whether he is brawling in a bar room, killing off his enemies or responding to the earliest natural phase of love, that of seeking a natural mate by fair means or foul.

His love for the little school teacher becomes the refining influence he needs, but, while she is strongly attracted by him, she does not feel equal to becoming an animal tamer—she declines his proposal of marriage. She is shortly after recalled to her home in some other part of the country and asked to wed a man who is in a position to save her father, mother and widowed sister from ruin. The Rancher, while riding about the country, comes upon one of those wandering evangelists who travel from place to place painting fearsome signs on rocks and boulders, "Prepare to meet thy God," and the like.

Ranger does not get tossed from his horse and land on his head in front of one of these, but they start a new train of thought in his mind. He invests in a prayer book and attempts to get religion unaided, much to the amusement of his boon companions. He is out riding one day when he witnesses a train wreck and rushes to the scene, arriving in time to participate in rescue. He and a clergyman comfort the last moments of a dying woman with a baby, none other than the widowed sister of the little school teacher. Rancher becomes the godfather of the child, and interest in it, together with a longing to rise above a life that merely supplies his bodily wants, leads him to take a trip which results in his meeting the woman he loves. He reverts to the primitive in thrashing the other man, lifts the family burden himself and proves himself to be very much of a man. He is lead to the happiness that his heart and mind most desire through an access of spiritual feeling in what constitutes a very pretty story.

"May Blossom"

The Famous Players Make Effective Film Out of Civil War Drama Written by Belasco Many Years Ago.

THE Belasco play which inspired this five-part Famous Players drama was produced so long ago that even the name is unfamiliar to all save a few of the present generation of theatergoers. If the picture depended upon the fame of the stage play for success its vogue would be limited; but it so happens that the film version is fully strong enough to stand on its own merits, for there is a romantic Civil War story of marked appeal, ably directed by Allan Dawn and acted with sincere feeling by Gertrude Robinson, Donald Crisp and Marshall Neilan at the three points of the lovers' triangle.

Fundamentally, the plot is by no means novel, but fortunately it is treated in a manner that does not leave the impression of a hackneyed idea met before in only slightly different guise. Two men are in love with the same girl; the one she prefers is captured by the enemy and the other takes advantage of the happening to announce the death of his rival, and in the course of time fills his place. May Blossom marries Steve, believing Richard to be dead, and then Richard returns. Much the same thing has occurred frequently in screen portrayals, but there is enough freshness in the treatment of the plot to make it interesting and in important scenes really dramatic.

The meeting of May and Richard, after she has married the other man and become the mother of a child, is a capital scene, alive with feeling, and there can be no certainty about the settlement of the problem confronting the woman, divided between love for her first sweetheart and love for her child. The solution is satisfactory, in that it affords Steve an opportunity to retrieve his good name and leaves May with the man to whom she is bound by law.

Pictorially, the film is of exceptional quality, with a wealth of splendid locations photographed on the summit of a cliff bordering on the sea. "May Blossom" always pleases the eye, and dramatically it does not offend a sense of the fitness of things in a romantic drama.

"The Paramount Law"

Adele Lane Makes First Appearance with Universal Film Manufacturing Company in Strong Three-Reeler.

Reviewed by Margaret I. MacDonald.

THE appearance of Adele Lane on the Universal program is evidently a happening of some moment, judging from the general quality of her first picture, "The Paramount Law," which will be released under the Big U brand some time near the end of May.

The scenario for this production was written by W. M. Caldwell from an old theme which has been given very fine treatment by both author and director. It has been handled more or less elaborately. Its exterior scenes are elegant and show deep perspectives, with an effulgence of floral growth that suggests California as the place where the production has been staged. Its interiors are also worthy of note as being tastefully and often richly appointed.

Burton King, in his handling of the author's work, is deserving of great credit, and one feels that intelligence has guided the making of the picture. To be sure, there is once or twice noticable a bit of padding; for instance, where the butler in the midst of his shaving makes bold to kiss the pretty housemaid. This, as far as can be seen, is apart from the main theme, and is hardly a legitimate side-step. This is, however, a mere glimpse into the domestic affairs of the servants, and passes too quickly to be worthy of much comment.

Adele Lane is delightful in the role of Janet Courteney, afterward Mrs. John Arnold, and later, believing her husband whom she has been forced to marry to save her father from financial ruin, and who, with a blow from his fist in a fit of temper, kills her father, to be dead, she marries her former lover. Edward Sloman as John Arnold does exceptionally good work, with William C. Dowlan as Bannister falling little if any below the standards set by Sloman. The application of the title is found in the closing scenes of the picture, where at the return of John Arnold, who is supposed to have committed suicide, Janet believing him to be a burglar, shoots and kills him as he stands behind the window curtains. At the trial she is acquitted on a verdict of "justifiable homicide."

THE Vitagraph producers know very well how to create excitement and suspense in out-and-out melodramas, such as "The Girl Who Might Have Been," written by Charles Brown and directed by Lionel Belmore. It is a thrilling detective story in which nearly all things are possible for the gifted leader of a band of criminals, and in which John Cheney, the master mind of the detective force, goes him one better at almost every turn. The battle of wits between these two is waged without a truce from the opening of the first reel until the fight on the roof of a building, from which the criminal plunges to his death in the yard below. The detective and the criminal and "the girl who might have been" the wife of the detective, save for her untimely death, are the conspicuous figures in a tale of strong situations, ingeniously contrived.

All of the characters are presented in a key of strained seriousness, for life is a very sombre and uncertain affair, likely to be terminated, one might suppose, at almost any moment. It is the approved method for the interpretation of photoplay melodrama, and helps, no doubt, to produce the tense atmosphere required in a picture of the type. Harry Morey and Ned Finley, as the detective and the arch criminal, are a well balanced pair, able to give the impression of a struggle between physical and mental giants—superior beings in the realm of crime and its prevention. The prowess of each is astonishing, and a worthy third in the campaign for supremacy is Enid Langford, "the girl who might have been," played with the requisite spirit by Betty Gray. Edward Elkas gives a good characterization of the stool-pigeon and Frank Currier is satisfactory as a hypnotist.

The picture introduces several novel and effective bits of business and advances steadily to the climax of the story without superfluous scenes. At the first showing in the Vitagraph Theater, the audience was unmistakably interested.

MISS RAY BEVERIDGE, who speaks from her experience in the trenches and in the hospitals of the European War, opened a "limited American Lecture Tour" at the Park Theater, New York City, on Saturday, April 24. Miss Beveridge, who is a sister of the gifted and famous sculptress, Kuehne Beveridge, was to have been introduced to the audience by Jeremiah O'Leary, the president of the American Truth Society. Mr. O'Leary, however, was not on hand, but some one read a letter from him and then presented Miss Beveridge to the audience. The young lady has a charming and magnetic presence, representing a fine type of young American womanhood. She is possessed of considerable elocutionary gifts, her delivery as well as her enunciation being of the best. She enlisted the attention of her audience from the start and held it closely while she continued to speak. She recounted most interesting and touching personal experiences, drawing a graphic and pathetic picture of conditions created by the war. Her lecture was rather short, much to the regret of the audience, which evidently wanted to hear more, and called her before the curtain three or four times.

The pictures which followed the lecture were good, but not all of them were new. A great variety was offered showing the war in all its phases, both in the eastern and western theaters. The slides were original and created much favorable comment. The less one says of the "lecture" given by the man who tried to follow the pictures the better. It was a preposterous attempt and acted as a strain on the patience of the auditors. The "lecturer" hindered rather than helped. The music was equally bad. A gay waltz was selected to accompany the scene which shows soldiers decorating the graves of their fallen comrades.

"The Model."

William Elliott Appears in World Film Corporation Five-Part Drama Based on "Woman and Wine."

Reviewed by Lynde Denig.

SENSATIONAL episodes and the ever-popular night life of Paris probably will win favor for this melodrama, founded on "Woman and Wine," a play that was quite successful a number of years ago. It is the first picture directed by Frederick Thompson since his connection with the World Film Corporation and presents William Elliott, always an engaging actor, in the leading role. Supporting him are Cynthia Day, Alec B. Francis, Dorothy Green, Henry Leoni and Miss Moussel.

For the most part it is a carefully presented film, although the strength of some of the scenes seems to have been lessened by unwise cutting. There is a tendency to chop off the action before the climax of the suspense has been reached, and every now and again there are annoying jumps. No fault need be found with the interior settings, such as the diningroom of a restaurant at the height of a spectacular party, and the court room in which Dick Seymour (William Elliott) is tried on the charge of murder; but the backdrop used for a street in Paris is too obviously artificial. The acting is satisfactory with the exception of a few scenes in which Miss Green over-plays the character of the model, intending, no doubt, to made the hardness of the woman unmistakable. This is sufficiently clear as the story develops without placing such emphasis on the coarseness of the girl's nature.

Scene from "The Model" (World Film).

The best bit of character drawing in the picture is given by the actor in the role of the hunchback.

Of the story, not a great deal need be said, for the theme has been tested and found appealing many times. It concerns a young man who is led astray by the enticements of a beautiful adventuress and abandons himself to the gayeties of night life in Paris. When he has squandered his fortune and tasted the dregs at the bottom of the wine cup, he is ready to return to his pretty and innocent sweetheart. The human interest, the heart appeal and the sensational happenings in "The Model" more than compensate for some technical shortcomings.

"The Unwelcome Wife."

A Strongly Emotional, Five-Reel Photodrama by Ivan Abramson, to Be Released by the Ivan Film Co.

Reviewed by Edward Weitzel.

LADY ISABEL, the unhappy heroine of "East Lynne," who has caused countless thousands to weep, is the prototype of Blanche Scott, the equally sorrowing heroine of Ivan Abramson's five-reel photodrama, "The Unwelcome Wife." The remarkable and enduring popularity of Mrs. Woods' play is easily accounted for; its appeal is wholly emotional, and its story a vivid revelation of the depths of a woman's love and suffering. The Abramson drama is built upon a similar foundation; although in plot and incident it bears no resemblance to the older play, and is an original and purposeful work.

A clearly defined underplot and numerous carefully thought-out situations give this story cogent proof of its kinship to fact and its power to beguile the sympathetic of their tears. Several short-cuts across ground upon which both probability and common sense have erected the sign, "Forbidden," and over-emphasis of the heroine's mad scenes, detract considerably from the merits of the photoplay. Occasional bits of comedy business of the "horse play" order also add nothing to the worth of the drama. Mr. Abramson prints the following upon his screen: "The burning question of this play is: Should the law supersede our moral rights? We ask you to decide this vital question." He refers to the justice of a court decree separating a man and wife for the cause given in "The Unwelcome Wife," and pleads his case with inward conviction, and frequently, with moving earnestness and commendable skill. But, an author who claims didactic and ethical qualities for his drama, must expect to be held to a stricter accountability than the writer who seeks only to entertain or amuse. The filming and acting of the play are admirable, Madame Lobel's personality and histronic methods being finely adapted to the title role. The lady is an actress of much force and deep feeling, and the resources of her art are at her instant command. William McNulty, R. G. Don, Ned Nye, Vivian Prescott and Ordean Stark are conspicuous figures in an intelligently selected cast.

STUART HOLMES TO MODEL BUST OF NANCE O'NEILL.

Although it is not generally known, Stuart Holmes, before gaining fame in the Cinema field, had built up quite a reputation in art circles as a sculptor of marked ability. He first studied sculpturing at the Chicago Art Institute under the renowned Loradis Taft. Later Mr. Holmes journeyed to Berlin, where he completed his course at the Berlin Institute of Art, securing his degree as Bachelor of Arts. To demonstrate the fact that his deft touch has lost none of its cunning, Stuart Holmes has agreed to model a bust of Nance O'Neill.

"THE LITTLE BAND OF GOLD."

United Film Service to Release Attractive Production Based on the Story of the Devotion of an Irish Couple.

Reviewed by Margaret I. MacDonald.

ONE of the most attractive points about this production, which, by the way, is in two reels, is the lowly domestic element portrayed in the family of Patrick, a night watchman, who is forced to pay the penalty for the felony of the head clerk in an establishment on his beat, where, one night on entering to investigate the reason for the doors being open, he is knocked on the head from behind by the clerk who has been in the act of robbing the safe, and is found later with the combination of the safe written on a paper in his hand bending over the open safe. He is arrested and sent to prison on circumstantial evidence.

Will Sheerer does fine work as the villain who, fifteen years later, confesses to the crime with his dying breath. It is a peculiar freak of circumstances that throws together the daughter of Patrick and the son of the man who ruined her father's life; and it is nicely illustrated how the Irish mother left alone with the burden of three children on her shoulders, scrubs and works until the little band of gold (wedding ring) which Pat has long since promised to replace with a new one, is worn all the way through. Pat, released from prison at the confession of the felon, hastens with his son to buy the new ring, so that in spite of obstacles he is able to replace the broken ring on the finger of the woman who had been faithful to her trust through all those bitter years.

Others of the cast are Edna Payne, whose pleasing personality always wins; Norbert Myles and George Larkin. The picture has been well photographed, and is one that will please almost any audience.

"Help Wanted."

Oliver Morosco Photoplay Company Presents Lois Meredith in a Five-Reel Screen Version of a Recent Play.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

THIS five-reel picture, made in association with Bosworth, Inc., is excellently acted, beautifully set and the photography is perfect, but the story is not strong in either human truth or in those dramatic qualities that keep one spellbound in spite of all things. Lois Meredith plays a stenographer out of work. Hobart Bosworth plays a rich and goatish broker in whose office she gets her first position. He is paying her ten a week, but she can not write a correct letter and the other girl in the office, who knows a thing or two, shrugs her shoulders. The broker's stepson is played by Owen Moore. It is a case of love at first sight between the two young people. In the broker's desk is a letter acknowledging receipt of $5,000 as quit claim signed by his former stenographer and her aunt. The ending is as expected.

Through three reels the story progresses slowly to a group of scenes beginning with the broker's keeping the new stenographer overtime to work on a bunch of papers. We know that the junior partner has a "date" with her. Soon he suspects that all is not right and hires a taxi to take him to the office where, in the meantime, a struggle has begun between the girl and the broker. He (to go back a bit) has found the quit claim letter and has it in his pocket. He rescues the girl, flashes the quit claim and there is a perfectly conventional make-up all around, which serves as an ending.

"The Bulldogs of the Trail"

A Spirited, Four-Reel Melodrama of the Northwest, Produced by the Picture Playhouse Film Co.

Reviewed by Edward Weitzel.

ACTION is the dominant note of "The Bulldogs of the Trail," a four-part melodrama of the northwest, written and produced by Kenneth MacDougall, who also enacts the leading role. The story has to do with the vengeance of a Hindoo secret society named "The Shrinto." John Graham, a prospector, and Inspector Creighton, of the Royal Northwest Mounted police, have incurred the enmity of the Hindoo Society by stealing its funds, while in India. The two men are tracked to the Canadian Northwest by agents of the society and murdered. Graham's daughter is then made a prisoner by the Hindoos, who intend to take her to India as a sacrifice. She is rescued by Lieut. McLoyd, a member of the Mounted Police.

A generous supply of exciting incidents, and an almost total absence of "cut-backs" keep the interest at the true melodramatic pitch. Producer MacDougall has shown excellent judgment in everything that makes for effective and well-posed pictures, and the photography is equal to the best. But two tones are used, one for the exterior and one for the interior views.

Miss Sydney Graham, who plays Peggy Graham, the daughter of the prospector, fits the demands of the type perfectly, and gives an earnest, womanly performance. Kenneth MacDougall is a manly and artistically correct Lieut. McLoyd. The John Graham of Wynne Davidson, and the Inspector Creighton of Hamilton Crane, are well executed characterizations.

"The Ladder of Love"

Two-Reel Pathe-Balboa in Which a Woman's Influence Proves an Inspiration to Better Deeds.

Reviewed by Margaret I. MacDonald.

IT IS not always that a moving picture production sufficiently backs up its title to satisfy the average mind. Of "The Ladder of Love," however, this cannot be said. It has a perfectly clear story, and shows in an intelligent way how the young man who had exasperated his father with repeated yieldings to intemperance, is turned out of his home, and by the merest accident is thrown into the presence of the girl who is destined to turn the tide of his morals.

It may be said further that this picture shows a distinct advance in the quality of Balboa productions. "The Ladder of Love" is a well-made picture, logical in its development, and shown without sub-titles to the press was understood without effort. The probability is that in its finished condition it will prove an especially entertaining number of the program of the Pathe exchange.

Without a knowledge of the names of players or director we can only say that the picture reflects credit on all, the cast being an especially good one.

As before stated, the story of the picture tells of the fall and rise of a young man who had run aground on the shoals of intemperance. One night after his dismissal from his father's house he rescues a pretty chorus girl from a ruffian. Later he marries her, buys stock in a mine of his father's which turns out to be a failure, and eventually is led to a reconcilia-

The production is well photographed, and displays some pleasing effects that are due largely to effective camera work.

"The Confession"

Two-Part Biograph Drama Offers Artistic Production of Strong Story With Unusual Plot.

Reviewed by Lynde Denig.

THE construction of this two-reel Biograph drama, to be released May 11, is far enough removed from ordinary photoplay conventions to make the picture distinctly interesting, even when one is most inclined to question the human likelihood of the happenings. Right at the opening of the story we are asked to sympathize with a strange father, whose grief over the death of his wife in childbirth, reacts into a morbid dislike for the innocent cause of the death. He leaves the little girl in the care of friends, a doctor and his wife, and goes to Paris with his son, intending to ignore the existence of his daughter, save that he supplies the money for her support.

As it happens, the little girl dies, but her guardians, rather than lose the steady income, make it appear that they have lost their own offspring, and their child is reared in the belief that they are not her parents. Years later, Howard's son returns from Paris, falls in love with the young woman and marries her. Then the father appears on the scene to inform him that his wife is in reality his sister. Tragic consequences are averted by the timely confession of the woman, who admits the deception of long standing.

There is ample opportunity for telling dramatic situations as this story progresses and grows more complex. The meeting between father and son and the girl he believes to be his daughter, provides a tense climax, well sustained through ensuing scenes, showing the bride on the verge of suicide and concluding with the confession that removes the cause for sorrow. It is a strong subject throughout and the cast is a good one, with Franklin Ritchie, Mary Malatesta, Jack Drumeir, Louise Vale, Gretchen Hartman and Kenneth Davenport in the principal roles.

Manufacturers' Advance Notes

"WHO VIOLATES THE LAW" (Lubin).

This is a strong three reel melodrama with all the action one could wish for, and excellent scenic effects, including a fire. The early part of the picture describes the workings of a "speak-easy" where drink is sold to the old soldiers by an old hag who is protected by the crooked sheriff. Then comes the work of a newspaper to expose the evil and who details a reporter on the job who happens to be the sweetheart of the crooked sheriff's daughter. The two interests clash and many dramatic episodes occur in which gunmen participate. The end, however, is in favor of the lovers and results in the undoing of those who violate the law. The picture is directed by Arthur Johnson who plays the leading role, assisted by Lottie Briscoe and his excellent company, which for years has been one of the most famous of the Lubin Studio. The atmosphere is perfect, and the acting of the entire cast very convincing.

"WHERE'S OLIVER?" (MinA).

In this release the "kindness to prisoners" method adopted at a state's prison is burlesqued. The theme offers excellent opportunity for some exceptionally funny scenes and situations, of which the MinA director has taken full advantage.

Scene from "Where's Oliver" (MinA).

The picture relates the dream of Harry, who, because of the good times he has heard in the lot of prisoners, attempts to gain entrance to the jail. He is told by a guard that membership may be gained only by "getting in dutch with law." Forthwith Harry proceeds to follow out the guard's advice. He liberally pounds a policeman, but the officer refuses to put him in jail. He roughhouses a cafe and tries to saw the jail bars, but these efforts fail to qualify him for jail membership. In desperation he steals a Flivver car, races down the road, bowling pedestrians right and left. At last he is arrested and put in jail, but in another state, for in his wild ride he crossed the state line, and instead of the kind treatment he expected, the warden puts him to work on a rock pile.

The leading comedy part is played by Harry LaPearl, the famous circus clown.

A TWO-PART MYSTERY DRAMA.

In the two-part picture drama, "One Summer's Sequel," Director Otto's company of the American Film Mfg. Co. presents an exceptionally strong story with a thread of mystery having a rather Ibsenesque ending. One of the big scenes is a double wedding, in which appears the other woman in the case, and while the reviewer is conversant with the general situation from the first, it is not until the final denouement that the knowledge of which woman is involved becomes clear. The cast has Winifred Greenwood and Edward Coxen as the leads, with George Field, Nan Christy, John Steppling, William Bertram and others supporting.

"LIFE'S STAIRCASE" (American).

An exceptionally clever production has been selected by the American Film Manufacturing Company to present their new "Beauty" Company star—Miss Neva Gerber. The title of the picture is "Life's Staircase" and Miss Gerber and Webster Campbell, as an engaged couple, form a very pleasing combination.

During the course of the story remembrances of past loves appear as the man and girl destroy the tokens given in memory of each infatuation. On the screen appear incidents leading up to each occasion, making this picture a wonderful tribute to the photographic art. All in all an exceptionally pretty subject has been finely treated throughout in a manner which will command enthusiastic comment from the picture-loving public.

GEORGE KLEINE TO MAKE "THE BATTLE."

George Kleine announces that he has secured the film rights to Cleveland Moffett's famous drama, "The Battle," work on which is already under way in the Kleine New York studios. An all-star Broadway cast has been engaged, featuring such well known artists as Frank Sheridan, Paul McAllister, Calvin Thomas, Sam Reid, Anne Meredith, Fania Marinoff and Bert Gudgeon. The interesting role of "John J. Haggleton" has been placed in the competent hands of Mr. Sheridan; "Moran," the half-demented, poverty-stricken old man of the east-side tenements, will be playd by Paul McAllister; "Philip Ames" by Calvin Thomas, and "Gentle" by Sam Reid. The strong, dramatic work which falls to the lot of "Jenny Moran" will be handled by Miss Fania Marinoff, while Anne Meredith and Mr. Bert Gudgeon will play the roles of "Margaret Lawrence" and "Joe," respectively. These players constitute one of the most pretentious casts in feature pictures.

"A STRANGER IN CAMP" (Universal).

Comedy and drama vie with each other in "A Stranger in Camp," a serio-comedy to be released by the Universal under the Victor brand on May 14. Brinsley Shaw plays a leading role and is ably assisted by three rough and ready miners. Much fun is obtained when the three miners, sleeping one above the other in three bunks are awakened by the entrance of Mr. Shaw in evening clothes. Their bare feet extend beyond the length of the meagre bunks while cold winds whistle outside and snow drifts in through the cracks of the roof.

The scenes in the drama were taken in the Adirondacks during a heavy storm early in April and among the actors is On-a-wat-sa, a descendant of the Iroquois tribe, who makes his home in a pine-board shanty on the crest of a mountain not far from the Saranac Lake. In one scene Mr. Shaw has a duel in the snows with the still hale and hearty old warrior. The Indian served as a guide to the moving picture players on their sojourn in the mountains and on two occasions his knowledge of the terrain prevented the players from becoming lost in a fierce snowstorm which started late in the night of March 31 and lasted for two days far up on the tops of the Appalachian range.

"GRIDLEY'S WIFE" (Reliance).

Giles Warren, the well known photoplay actor, director and author, has joined the Reliance forces on the coast. He is to produce a series of original plays written by him. The first is now being filmed. It is "Gridley's Wife."

It provides remarkable touches in original handling of the basic situations in life. For instance, he gives the most unusual touch to the ending of "Gridley's Wife." Gridley suspects his wife, because she has consented to meet her pursuer. Gridley is on the scene when his wife leaves the house, but to his surprise and that of future spectators in the photoplay theaters, the wife trains Gridley's revolver upon the "other man" and forces him to sign a confession of his evil designs.

Gridley then appears and forces the "other man" to drink to the health "of the best and truest wife a man ever had."

wife, but she sees this repudiation of the "other man" by Mrs. Gridley and kisses the young woman's hand in token of her surrender to Mrs. Gridley.

The principal parts are played by Thomas Wilson, Claire Anderson and Raymond Wells.

It is believed from this original start of Giles Warren that his coming photoplays will rank high.

Tom Terriss and his associates in the Terriss Feature Film Co. have begun the filming of their second feature in Jamaica, West Indies. The first picture entitled "The Pearl of the Antilles," has been placed in the hands of the Picture Playhouse Film Co., New York, within the past few days and prints will soon be ready for distribution. The Picture Playhouse people have secured exclusive rights to the Terriss releases throughout the world.

Mr. Terriss' choice of the island of Jamaica as a place for the making of photoplays is abundantly justified by both the still and motion pictures of the Jamaican scenery which have been received in New York. A number of the scenes which have been utilized in "The Pearl of the Antilles" will stand out as master pictures from the photographer's standpoint.

PICTURE THEATER EQUIPMENT CO. OPENS BRANCH IN BUFFALO.

H. T. Edwards, the owner of the Picture Theater Equipment Co., of New York City, has opened a branch office in Buffalo, N. Y., at the corner of Pearl and Church streets. The office was opened on the day the National League had its annual meeting in Buffalo and Mr. Edwards attended the convention in person. He became acquainted with the leading exhibitors in Buffalo in a very short time and the New York men were anxious to testify to Mr. Edwards' practical friendship for the exhibitor. The new office is in charge of J. P. Quinn, an energetic young man well-known among exhibitors and operators. Service and efficiency will be the watchwords of the branch just as they have been the motto of the parent organization in New York.

KLEINE COMPLETES "THE SPENDTHRIFT."

George Kleine's film version of "The Spendthrift," Porter Emerson Browne's great drama, was completed at the Kleine New York Studios last week. The story features Irene Fenwick, who is supported by an able cast, which includes Cyril Keightley, Malcolm Duncan and a number of other prominent Broadway players. Advance reports indicate "The Spendthrift" will prove a genuine sensation. It is said to be a remarkably strong dramatic offering. This is George Kleine's first American-made drama and follows his four delightful comedies, "Officer 666," "Stop Thief," "The Commuters," and "Who's Who In Society."

MEXICAN PICTURE NEXT.

With the Interstate Feature Film Co.'s first release just about ready for the market, "The Grandee's Ring" is announced as the title for the second release. The company will make two big features a month for release through the Picture Playhouse Film Co.

Kenneth MacDougall, general manager and director of the company, is a strenuous American character and the pictures planned by the Interstate people will reflect his personality. "Bulldogs of the Trail," the first release, has its scenes laid, for the most part, in the Great Canadian Northwest and the second picture will introduce vastly different American continental types hailing from the locale of Old Mexico.

TO CONDUCT BIG SALES CAMPAIGN.

The Radium Gold Fibre Screen, Inc., people are now comfortably housed in their new quarters on the tenth floor of the Candler Bldg., 220 West Forty-second street, New York City, and plans are being made for one of the most aggressive selling campaigns which has ever been conducted by a company selling any kind of motion picture accessories or supplies.

J. L. Kempner, who will direct the activities of the company's sales force, is widely known in the commercial world as well as in the motion picture industry—and in commercial circles.

JOSEPH GOLDEN COMPLETING "FINE FEATHERS."

The five-part photoplay, "Fine Feathers," with Janet Beecher in the stellar role, is nearing completion under the guiding hand of Joseph A. Golden. We are not making any rash promises, but think we have a photoplay that will make the natives sit up and take notice. Work on "The Price," by George Broadhurst, with Helen Ware, has been started. Arthur H. Jacobs, president of the Cosmos Feature Film Corporation, will be ready to announce future releases of his corporation within the next fortnight. An extensive advertising campaign has been planned and the first announcement, in the form of an ad, will be made on or about May 15.

CHANGES IN ALLIANCE EXCHANGES.

Last week saw the change of management in the Pittsburgh Alliance Exchange and the addition of Cleveland to the list of Alliance offices. In Pittsburgh the new headquarters which will be located at 404 Ferry Street, will be known as the Alliance Film Service of Pittsburgh. The Cleveland branch is located at 420 Columbia Building, and will be known as the Alliance Film Service of Ohio.

These two offices have been fully stocked and between them will supply Western Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Kentucky and Ohio. Phillip Adler, who is one of the best known film men in that territory is responsible for the management of these two branches. Mr. Adler will as far as it is practicable divide his time between the two offices.

"THE SHOP NUN" (United).

In the exceptionally entertaining and high class two part drama "The Shop Nun" which will be released by United Program on May 5, the splendid portrayal of "Ruth Eaton," the sweet, serious minded little business woman whose depth and sincerity have won for her the title of the "Shop Nun" by Marian Swayne adds still other laurels to those already won by the charming little leading lady for the Empress Company. Miss Swayne's usual impulsive charm gives place in this picture to a quiet reserve which only displays the more to her enthusiastic admirers her versatility. The story of the photodrama, which promises to be one of the most artistically put on pictures which has yet appeared on the United Program, is of an attractive, well educated and refined young woman who eventually wins the heart of her wealthy young employer through her sincerity after he has lost faith in women through the unfair treatment he has received at the hands of his former mercenary fiance.

The picture is directed by Joseph Levering, the clever young actor director who plays the leading role opposite Miss Swayne in all the United-Empress pictures.

ALLIANCE HAS NEW POSTER POLICY.

While Andrew J. Cobe, the head of the Alliance, is emphatic in his contention that success can only come to the exhibitor who shows his patrons the best films made, he still believes that persistent use of a strong lobby display while being a secondary consideration, is one of great importance in the management of a picture theater.

Mr. Cobe is so convinced his contention is correct, that he is having made on all the current releases of the Alliance Films Corporation, not only the usual selection of one, three and six sheets, but is further augmenting this by a twenty-four sheet combination stand.

When the Alliance exchanges were sounded upon the advisability of having this paper made, they were unanimous in their approval of the proposition.

The new paper which is being made by the Morgan Lithograph Co. of Cleveland will be ready for delivery in the immediate future, and is expected to fill a long-needed but unvoiced want.

INTERESTING POLITICAL PLOT.

In "The Altar of Ambition," a two part "Flying A" production, with Vivian Rich and David Lythgoe in the stellar parts, a clever political plot is introduced and most ably presented. The story adheres closely to things political and the appropriateness of the settings show great care in staging. Miss Rich, as the unjustly accused wife and Jack Richardson, the tempter, hold the attention, while the plot unfolds, bringing in the other players so that interest is given to every scene. As politics is a subject which is of interest to all, this picture is bound to be welcomed.

OTTO PRODUCES COMEDY.

Director Henry Otto, of the American Studios, has produced a splendid comedy entitled "The Broken Window." The action begins at a scrub ball game when a batted ball crashes through a window and thereupon ensues the requisite complications. The director sacrificed one of the windows of his own home to get the real atmosphere. The American productions have become very popular because of the realism injected into them by all of the players who veritably live their parts.

"THE INGRATITUDE OF LIZ TAYLOR" (Selig).

"The Ingratitude of Liz Taylor" is a Selig comedy-drama in two reels, produced by E. J. Le Saint, from the original story written by Maibelle Heikes Justice. This is a picture play of true heart interest, containing flashes of both pathos and comedy.

Jimmie O'Meara, an orphan newsboy of ten years, has an abiding love for Liz Taylor, who has been kind to him. Liz Taylor and Ben Bradshaw find employment in an overall factory through the instrumentality of Jimmie. Jimmie is later the cause of Ben's promotion, and the discharge of Doyle, foreman of the factory. Armed with a big bouquet, Jimmie visits Liz and proposes marriage. Liz and Ben, in love with each other, although convulsed with laughter, look upon the little fellow with love and compassion. Liz kisses his cheek and tells Jimmie that when she and Ben are married, he shall live with them.

Stunned with his great love, and the thought of all that he has already done for Liz, Jimmie cannot see it nor understand. Slowly, he and his pet dog, Sport, go out. Downstairs on the doorstep he sits down to think it over. Still there is only one thought in his mind. With his arm thrown around faithful Sport, Jimmie exclaims: "Ain't that the ingratitude of a woman!"

This picture play contains many beautiful scenic effects and the characters are enacted by an all-star cast, including Guy Oliver, Vivian Reed, Eugenie Besserer, and others. It is to be released Monday, May 10.

"NO OTHER WAY" (Lubin).

As this interesting and exciting serial progresses, wonderful events multiply. Alene, by telling Gilbert Jerome that she knows that Abner Grey killed old Gershom, because he wears a ring that she saw on the hand grasping the portiere the night of the crime, has caused Abner to be accused and sentenced to be hanged. Terrified at the thought, she consults a lawyer, who tells her that she must testify, the only exception being a wife, and to avoid this she immediately marries Abner. Later on, returning to the Duncan home, she finds a note which decoys her to an old mill supposedly to meet Robert Dane. Responding to the call, she is there met by Clara Delane who claims to be Jerome's wife. Once inside, the woman hurls her into a pool of slimy water, there to die. This episode is probably the most dramatic one released, and gives Mary Charleson, the heroine, much opportunity for forceful acting. Emmett Campbell Hall has undoubtedly evolved a wonderful story, and the Lubin Company are giving it the full value of scenic effect and an excellent cast.

"WHEN EMPTY HEARTS ARE FILLED." (American).

Scenes aboard a fishing boat and along shore abound in a particularly appealing human interest drama released in the Mutual program, May 5, by the American Film Manufacturing company under the title of "When Empty Hearts Are Filled." Vivian Rich and Harry Von Meter are featured by the Flying "A" in this drama, but Louise Lester, Reaves Eason and G. E. Rainey are also included in the cast.

For motion picture purposes as nearly perfected a scene as could be devised is recorded on the film when Vivian Rich as Nancy Latham is shown discovering far at sea the shipwrecked child securely tied to a floating hatch, and her sub-

Miss Rich's acting, which is of a sort too well known to require extended description, furnishes a pleasantly charming contrast to the rough and rugged characterization given the role of Paul Latham, the fisherman husband, by Harry Von Meter.

"THE MELTING POT" (Cort).

In spite of the fact that Walker Whiteside, a big star of the legitimate stage, has been engaged to play the leading part of the screen in so famous a play as Israel Zangwill's "The Melting Pot," the Cort Film Corporation is said to have mounted the production with a brilliancy of setting and strength of numbers as are seldom found in a photoplay with so much drawing power in the names of star, play and author. "The Melting Pot" will come as near to being a great spectacle as any American production which has been made to deal with the happenings and life of the present generation.

Hundreds of people have been used in the big scenes of the film, such as the Kishinef massacre scenes, to which two days were given over by the directors. In the massacre "mobs" 650 people and 200 horses were used and the whole thing was made realistic under the eye of men who were in Kishinef at the time of the tragedy and who were present at the time of the terrible slaughter. Fifty per cent of the people who appeared in the scenes were emigrants from Russia and made absolute types picked up from lower East Side agencies. One family of fifteen persons were actually in one massacre at Kishinef and were sent to this country as a result of the popular subscription raised for the benefit of the sufferers at the time. This family was hired for the massacre scenes and the steerage scenes on board an ocean liner.

Three hundred and seventy-five persons were sent down the bay on tugs one day and then transferred off Sandy Hook to the S. S. Paloma, where the steerage scenes were taken all the way up New York Bay. As there are no immigrants coming to the United States to speak of now, there was plenty of room in the steerage of the Paloma for the company to work. Pictures were taken while the Paloma was under steam and also laying at anchor.

Among the other big scenes which have been mentioned, such as the concert hall scenes in which Mr. Whiteside directs an orchestra of 100 symphony players, great care has been taken in reproducing the pomp and brilliant circumstance with which the court of the Russian Czar is surrounded.

MAJESTIC CHILDREN'S PICTURES.

The experiment made by the Majestic of offering regularly child subjects acted by children and written for children has been very successful. "The Baby," the first release of this kind, was booked very heavily, so the Majestic has formed a permanent stock company of children, all under the ages of ten, to act child subjects. They will be produced by the two Franklin brothers, who have had much experience in directing child players.

The second release will be "The Rivals," by Russell E. Smith. The child company appears in this photoplay headed by George Stone, Violet Radcliffe and Carmon de Rue. In all of these "kid" comedies many toys dear to childhood are used, such as little automobiles, little boats, steam engines, etc.

SELIG "DIAMOND SPECIALS."

On every Thursday, beginning with Thursday, May 20, the Selig Polyscope Company will release a Selig Diamond Special in three reels. The releases will be made through the regular service of the General Film Company. The first Diamond Special released on Thursday, May 20, will be "The Two Natures Within Him." This is a gripping story, having to do with a dual personality. Thomas Santschi and Miss Bessie Eyton take the leading roles. Other Diamond Specials to be released weekly through the regular service of the General Film Company will include "How Callahan Cleaned Up Little Hell," "Pals in Blue," with Tom Mix; "His Father's Rifle," a Diamond Special of Jungle-Zoo atmosphere, etc. These Selig Diamond Specials were originally produced as features, but will be released in the General Film Company's regular service.

"MAC" BARNES AS BOSS.

"Mac" Barnes, playing the part of the Boss in Knickerbocker Star Features, directed by Robert T. Thornby, finds himself in his element. For two years he played with Frank Keenan in his act entitled "Vindication," in which he played the part of the Governor. Mr. Barnes puts great power and personality in his role of Boss, proving by his masterly work that he is a man of experience.

RAY MYERS FIRST PICTURES.

The first production of Ray Myers, as a director, since his promotion from player to camera executive for the Majestic will be "Mike's Elopement," a light comedy drama of childhood. Violet Wilkey, the talented child actress, plays the part of the small object of small Mike's affections. She is supported by Harold Goodwin, Fred Burns and Pearl Sherwood. The production is in one reel and is now in the making.

"THE VICTIM" (Majestic).

The notable release of the week included in the Mutual's announcement is the three-part Mutual masterpicture, "The Victim," by Paul West, whose growing reputation as a photodramatist has to some extent obscured his, by no means, insignificant fame as a humorist. In the cast the volatile Mae Marsh is particularly featured. She is ably supported by Robert Harron and Eugene Pallete. The latter figures in the big scene in the play where two burglars, locked securely in a safe, have a desperate hand to hand conflict as thrilling as it is decisive. This desperate encounter is made the most of in a faithful and realistic presentation by Mr. Pallette and W. H. Brown.

"The Victim" makes use of the plight of the man unjustly convicted of a crime committed by another, and the young hero's struggle to keep his past concealed and rehabilitate himself, is sure of winning any audience's sympathy. The incidental action arouses and holds the interest. Early in the story occurs the escape of the two convicts from the penitentiary, and the pursuit is characterized by good suspense. As the young man sets out in the world, re-establishes himself and marries, the audience feels constantly apprehensive lest his pursuer, the convict whose crime he was convicted of, find him out, and when this catastrophe actually happens their protective interest is immediately aroused.

From the actors the story exacts unmeasured expenditure of emotional effort. Miss Marsh, when she had finished rehearsals, took to her bed for two days, the strain of the production had so exhausted her, and she complained to George Seigmann, who did the directing, that for the next month she intended to ask for nothing but light comedy parts. On the other hand, Mr. Pallette and Mr. Brown took the safe fight scene so seriously and acted it so realistically that they were absent from work for three days subsequently to its picturing. Betty Marsh, Mae Marsh's little niece, and Ernest Evers are included in the cast.

"THE FLAMING SWORD" (Rolfe).

With two stars featured, B. A. Rolfe is making every effort to give the Metro Pictures Corporation another finished production in "The Flaming Sword, in which Jane Grey and Lionel Barrymore make their joint appearance.

Director Middleton and a company of eighteen principals journeyed to Peeks Island, Maine, where a small schooner was engaged and the company lived aboard for two weeks while the various scenes, showing the islands, coast and reefs were staged out of sight of the usual mob of curiosity seekers.

The party discovered rocky ledges, rugged jagging reef-bound spots and on these, the scenes between Meera and Steve, the two principal characters, were set.

A row of fishermen's cottages was built and a considerable amount of masonry had to be constructed to get the desired period effect.

"The Flaming Sword" is from the pen of George Gibbs and was done as a play some years ago. A typical Rolfe cast supports Miss Grey and Mr. Barrymore. "The Flaming Sword" will be released as a unit on the Metro program, May 14.

MISS LEONARD IN "MRS. DANE'S DEFENSE."

Miss Marion Leonard has now completed the production of "Mrs. Dane's Defense" and is starting right in on "Zira," with S. E. V. Taylor directing this piece as the other. As a scenic production "Mrs. Dane's Defense" ranks high but the average observer will be unable to realize the trouble occasioned the director by the many changes of scenes. In a total of 27 scenes no less than 21 full sets of period furniture were required and following the theme of the story, this furniture must be of the best.

Miss Leonard has just returned to the game after a severe illness and as "Mrs. Dane's Defense" is her first big production, naturally there was considerable interest in her performance, but she showed no bad effects from the strain and finished the big picture in such good shape that she is preparing to plunge right into another big picture at once. The star received good support from both Miss Mabel Montgomery and Charles Dalton in this piece as well as aid of a sterling character from the minor characters. Mr. Dalton surprised himself and Mr. Taylor by the unusually small amount of trouble he had in playing up to the "silence" and there is never any question as to the quality of Miss Montgomery's work.

STRONG CAST IN "THE CLIMBERS."

Clyde Fitch's "The Climbers" has just been completed by the Lubin Company and promises to attract wide interest through the strength of the play itself, the importance of the cast and the extravagance of the production. Clay M. Greene made the scenario and Barry O'Neil produced the play. Gladys Hanson, one of the best known of the younger emotional actresses on the stage to-day, is featured in the production, and supporting her are such Lubin favorites as George Soule Spencer, Walter Hitchcock, Bernard Siegel, Charles Brandt, Peter Lang, Walter Law, Eleanor Barry, Ruth Bryan, Frankie Mann, Edith Ritchie, Walter Clarke, Mildred Gregory, Rosetta Brice and Florence Hackett.

KLEINE OPENS NEW OFFICE.

George Kleine has opened a new office in Kansas City in which bookings for that territory can be made. The ever-increasing volume of business from Kansas and Missouri necessitated the new office. John Hardin, formerly of the Kleine Dallas Office, will be in charge at 209-12 Ozark Building.

MACKENZIE MAKING A BIG PATHE FEATURE.

Donald MacKenzie, the Pathe producer, announces that he is making a four reel feature called "The Fortunes of Pierre," which has all the earmarks of a notable success. Mr. MacKenzie has assembled cast of well known players, most of whom have already achieved fame on the screen. George Probert, who won golden opinions as Oskar Von Guggen in "Innocent," and the Cadet in "The Lure," has the lead, and this picture marks his debut before the camera. Mr. Probert confesses that his first two days of picture acting were little less than torture to him. The first of the lens staring at him all the time was infinitely more dreadful than the batteries of critical eyes on a big "opening night."

Paul Panzer, after weeks of successful vaudeville touring, returns to the screen again in this picture Mr. Panzer, it will be remembered, made himself the best hated villain in the country through his work as "Owen" in "The Perils of Pauline." Other members of the cast are Miss Alma Martin, a popular favorite in the "legitimate," Sam Ryan, who has been in many Pathe pictures, and Charles Bunnell, who was with the Pathe St. Augustine Company in the winter of 1913-14.

The picture requires hundreds of supers and Mr. MacKensie has made arrangement for a troop of cavalry, regulars of the United States Amy, who will appear in a number of stirring scenes. George Brackett Seitz wrote the scenario.

STEADY BOOKINGS ON "JUDITH OF BETHULIA."

When the second edition of new copies of "Judith of Bethulia" went into service at the various exchanges of the General Film Company a month ago, that company reduced the renting cost of this production, and in spite of the lower renting cost the returns on this production for the month of April just ending will exceed that of the first month's returns last year when "Judith" was first released. This means that more than three times as many exhibitors are booking this production, at the present time, than a year ago. Of this number more than 50 per cent represent repeat bookings.

With perfect copies, a prominent cast consisting of Henry Walthall, Blanche Sweet, Mae Marsh, Lillian Gish, Robert Harron, Kate Bruce, Harry Carey and other equally well known artists, and a renting cost which brings "Judith" within the reach of the smaller theaters, it is safe to predict that a third edition of new copies of this four-reel masterpiece will be necessary.

"FATE'S ALIBI" (Universal).

Real newspaper atmosphere is filmed in "Fate's Alibi," a Laemmle one-reel drama featuring Helen Leslie, Marc Robbins and M. K. Wilson, to be released on May 16. Pretty Helen Leslie is cast as Ruth Hope, a cartoonist on the staff of "The Times."

She is a penchant for making sketches from real life and on a street car one day sketches a crook. Her portrait is later turned over to the police when the crook is wanted for a crime, and results in the identification of the criminal.

The latter, a good looking young man, uses the money he has stolen from the fair young cartoonist to rehabilitate himself and a short time before the police nab him he makes restitution for his crime and gains a firm friend in the young artist. Most newspaper offices in moving picture stories are very prim, precise affairs with neat rows of desks and spotless floors. One would hardly know them from a bank or big insurance business office. In "Fate's Alibi," however, the producer, Frank Lloyd, evidently has paid a visit to one of the Los Angeles newspaper offices for, true to tradition, the newspaper office set is a smear from end to end. Glue, ink, waste paper, stacks of coarse copy paper and forty-eleven editions of all the papers in town litter the floor. All the newspaper boys in the picture are handsome, disreputable looking cusses who walk about as if their dark pasts and the world's crimes were bearing them down to an early grave.

Scene from Fate's Alibi" (Universal).

"The Red Seal of Quality"

"Graustark" Made Author Rich; Story Thrilled Many Millions

GEORGE BARR McCUTCHEON comes of a family that makes its living by dreaming. It is a distinguished family and the works of the McCutcheon boys are known all over the world. For they dream dreams of stories, paintings, cartoons and books.

MANY dreams had been dreamed by George Barr McCutcheon before he finally happened on that most wonderful and beautiful of them all—"Graustark." Mr. McCutcheon had been writing for a number of years. He had written a great many successful short stories and several novels. He took a vacation and went to Europe. He did not follow the tourist route, but sought out those picturesque villages that are known to but few. Then he found that most wonderful of all mythical countries—"Graustark."

NATURALLY Mr. McCutcheon chose an American for his hero. This young Grenfall Lorry is of the type that every one loves. He is of the daringly romantic kind that follows the beautiful princess of his dreams to the furthest parts of the earth. Millions of persons read of the adventures of Grenfall Lorry in "Graustark." In fact, the novel was declared to be the most popular ever published in America.

ESSANAY saw the possibilities of "Graustark." Mr. McCutcheon also realized the value of his story. Many other large film companies had angled for this great feature. Mr. McCutcheon, however, was not after money alone. He wanted to be assured that "Graustark" would be given the greatest production of any photoplay. ESSANAY convinced the author. And that's a pretty hard thing to do. You will be convinced beyond a doubt when you see this remarkable drama. It is in six acts and every act is a continuous thrill.

"GRAUSTARK" is the first of the big ESSANAY FEATURES. It was released April 26. All of these will be released through the new Vitagraph-Lubin-Selig-Essanay company. The Branch offices where the exhibitor can book direct are located at the following addresses: New York, 1600 Broadway; Chicago, S. E. Corner Adams and Wabash, Chicago Business College; Atlanta, 75 Walton St.; Kansas City, 12th and Walnut, Boley Bldg.; Dallas, 1900 Commerce St.; San Francisco, temporary address, C. B. Price, Hotel Stewart.

Two swallows do not make a summer.

Nor does a stage play plus a stage star make a feature picture.

No man can learn in one year the knowledge it has taken another eighteen years to acquire.

The Vitagraph-Lubin-Selig-Essanay, Inc., has had eighteen years' experience in making motion pictures.

We are using this experience plus a story and a star in making artistic and entertaining feature picture plays.

We are not trying to put any of our competitors out of business so we are not interested in the cutting of prices.

We are interested in helping the exhibitor make money so that he can pay us a higher price for a superior product.

We do not ask the exhibitor to pay us large sums in advance.

We do not ask the exhibitor to sign long contracts.

We are satisfied to let the quality of our productions speak for themselves.

The motion picture art was not developed by any one concern.

It has developed itself with the assistance of the pioneers of the industry who have striven for eighteen years to give the public what the public demanded.

We have eliminated the middle man.

We propose to divide his profits between the exhibitor and the production.

theater proper can be utilized as well as any space can be fitted at a very moderate cost. The frame illustrated above contains nine of these pictures and is completely equipped with wiring and long reflecting globes, all enclosed. The pictures are placed in the frame in such a manner that they can easily be changed. Each day's program can be reflected in this frame by showing the popular faces appearing on the screen. The single tranparencies are very moderate in price and the exhibitor can use each popular player's picture many times during the year.

Beury Feature Film

Conness-Till Company Has Been Reorganized Under the Above Name—James P. Beury, of Philadelphia, the Principal Stockholder, Has Taken Over the Company's Liabilities—Making Big Feature Productions Will Be the New Policy.

By David K. Billings, Toronto Correspondent of Moving Picture World.

A COMPLETE reorganization of the Conness-Till Film Company is taking place as a result of a special assignment made by certain of the shareholders who protested against policies adopted by the management. The result is that James P. Beury of Philadelphia, as the principal shareholder, has purchased the liabilities of the company, and after extensive alterations will reopen the studios under the name of the Beury Feature Film Company. Edwards H. Robins, the leading man, who is also financially interested in the undertaking, will remain and look after the reorganization, as will L. Physiog, technical director.

The last release of the company, "The Faithful Servant," will not be followed by another for about eight weeks and in the meantime work is to be started on a big feature which will be announced in the near future. Mr. Beury has completed arrangements with several well known actors, who will appear in an entirely new company along with the local actors.

MAKES ALL KINDS OF SOUNDS.

"Joe" Macdonald, who plays the "accesories" at the Garden theater, makes the boast that he has the most complete set of its kind in use in any moving picture theater. Beside the regular quotery of drums and cymbals, he has chimes and wall bells, xylophone and a regular workshop of toys and noise makers of various kinds, mirimbaphone and tymphanis. Every accesory is worked electrically and he has at his fingertips 14 buttons and also four foot levers. The effects he obtains are more than worth the trouble has has gone to get them. The entire outfit weigh under one ton.

TORONTO NOTES.

Maurice Kauffmann, formerly with the World Film Corporation, as traveling salesman, has been appointed manager of the Toronto office of the Pathe Feature Film Company of Quebec.

W. F. Sexton, manager of the Family theater in Queen street, east, collected over two barrels of potatoes from his potato contest, which he held recently and he presented them to the Creche. This week he is holding a bun contest and offering a prize to the best home-made buns, the buns to be given to the same institution. A flag drawing contest brought in nearly one hundred drawings from children. He admits them free of charge on Saturday afternoon when accompanied by a parent.

The Palace theater in West Toronto was badly damaged by fire last Monday afternoon during the afternoon performance. The fire was caused by defective wiring and was not in any way connected with the operating side of the theater. The audience escaped in safety.

The general situation in Ontario has improved remarkably during the last three or four weeks, and in contrast to the extreme quietness of the winter months theaters throughout the province are now doing a roaring trade. "The Spoilers," which was given a first run at the Strand theater, drew capacity houses and broke all records for the theater after playing to good houses on the road. The Pathe recruit pictures at the Princess were a big drawing card. The decision of the Ontario censors not to allow the Willard-Johnson fight pictures may possibly be reconsidered after the pictures have been shown to them at a private exhibition to be held here.

We will gladly print news items of interest.

BUFFALO NEWS NOTES.

By Billy Bison, Buffalo (229 Oxford Ave.) Correspondent of Moving Picture World.

FIRE recently damaged the New Arcadia moving picture theater at 439 William street, Buffalo. They did so in good order while the piano player furnished suitable music.

"Satan" was featured to crowded houses at the Palace moving picture theater, Buffalo, April 29, 30 and May 1. One hundred and fifty exhibitors attended a private screening of this film at the Palace and enthused over the exhibition. The C. B. Keith Film Co. of Buffalo, of which D. N. Hyman is president, controls this production in New York State, including New York City.

Dean McCloskey, George Vogenberger and Jack Scott are starting a film express in Pittsburgh. They have purchased a car and promise prompt service. These men are familiar with all parts of the film game and appreciate what it is to have a film on time.

G. R. Ainsworth, formerly of the Pittsburgh offices of the George Kleine Attractions and the Fox Film Corporation, is now located in the office of the Continental Feature Film Cmpany's at 420 Penn avenue, Pittsburgh, Pa., as local representative for "The Diamond from the Sky." Mr. Ainsworth showed his enterprise on last Sunday by giving a private exhibition at the Columbia in Fifth avenue exhibiting only the first three chapters of the new serial. The audience with one accord was unanimous in proclaiming what they saw as the greatest serial ever shown and Mr. Ainsworth has since been besieged with contracts.

The Princess, Windber, Pa., which was reopened a few weeks ago, after being closed several months, is now known as the Majestic theater.

M. Letzelter, of the Bloomfield district of Pittsburgh, Pa., is having plans prepared for the erection of a large moving picture theater in that district. The Star theater at Wilcox, Pa., which has been closed for repairs and remodeling for some time, reopened last Saturday. W. C. Van Alstine is the manager of this theater.

To Censor in Springfield

Complaints Made About Pictures to Mothers' Clubs in Illinois Capital Led to Investigation by a Committee—A Few Films Like "Smashing the Vice Trust" Made Censorship Seem Necessary—Authorities Will Be Petitioned.

By Frank H. Madison, Illinois Correspondent of Moving Picture World.

A LOCAL censorship movement in Springfield is more definite than any of the preceding agitations in that city.

The movement originated with the school committee of the Patron's Clubs of the city schools. Mrs. John S. Caldwell, chairman of this committee announced that complaints about pictures made to mothers' clubs were justified. It was only after an investigation by the committee that it was found that some films shown in Springfield needed censorship.

This committee will confer with other civic organizations and a committee from the whole will go before the city commission and ask for action.

The film "Smashing the Vice Trust," shown at an East St. Louis house, was condemned at a meeting of the Woman's Civic Federation in that city.

A committee was appointed to visit the different picture houses and report on the kind of pictures shown.

Mrs. William B. Owens, of Chicago, at a meeting of the Woman's Club in Watseka, criticised the members for not censoring the moving pictures.

GERDA HOLMES VISITS PLANO.

Gerda Holmes, until recently of the Essanay Company, recently visited friends in Plano. While there she appeared at the Grand theater and while "The Song in the Dark," a favorite picture, was shown, she duplicated her film appearance by singing "My Rosary."

WITH THE MANAGERS.

Not all Illinois managers have spring fever. "The Adventures of Kitty Cobb" was shown by the Colonial at Joliet as a benefit for the Girls' Club of Christ church. The first motion pictures made in Aledo were those taken to testify to the enterprise and to add to the revenues of the South Side theater. Rest rooms are brought nearer for Rock Island working girls after a benefit at the Empire. Two days at Dreamland, in Kewanee, were given over to the local labor assembly. Newsboys in Aurora were guests of the Fox at a show of the Williamson submarine pictures. The Palm, at Rockford, showed "When We Were Twenty-one" for the benefit of the local nurses' association. The P. & O. band, at Canton, is one of the foremost in the state. It gave a concert in front of the Princess, which showed "The Wolf," to aid the musicians' treasruy. The Stuart Lincoln is featuring the Keith Sisters' lady orchestra, which appeared in Springfield houses some time ago. "Genuine moving pictures" were made in Princeton for the Eagles. The Star, at Marseilles, exhibited "Mother" for the local Universalist church. The Princess, at Woodstock, is playing up a new Bartola.

ILLINOIS BRIEFS.

Portraits of Mary Fuller and Rosemary Theby were stolen from the lobby of the Princess at Urbana.

St. Boniface school hall at Quincy has started a series of weekly picture shows.

DETROIT KRITERION OPENS.

New Exchange Has Housewarming—Prominent Folk Present.

As previously announced, the official opening of Detroit's latest film exchange, the Detroit Kriterion Film Co., at 185 East Jefferson avenue, took place on Monday evening, April 19. Invitations had been extended to every exhibitor in the state and a great many of them took advantage of the welcome sign and visited the new exchange, which is certainly as complete as any in the city. In fact no new exchange ever opened up right from the start with such splendidly equipped and extensive quarters, which would indicate that the men behind the Detroit Kriterion Company are confident of big business. The exhibitors started to inspect the new quarters after eight. At ten o'clock the company started to run off film on the second floor, which is the regular projection room. At eleven o'clock a Dutch lunch and light beverages were served. Those present included exhibitors and their ladies, and some from Ohio, such as Mr. and Mrs. Robert Melroy, of Tiffin; C. E. Adams and wife, of North Baltimore, and A. J. Phalert and wife, of Toledo. During the serving of the lunch Peter Jeup was delegated to act as toastmaster, and proved an excellent one. He extended very best wishes to the new firm and hoped for their success. Otto Seestedt, a member of the new firm, was called upon for a few remarks. He said that the new firm would put its shoulder to the wheel and would do everything in its power to help the exhibitor. Ralph Peckham, general manager of the Detroit Kriterion Film Company, told who the Kriterion Company was and the opportunity there was for a fourth program. He discussed the tecnical end of the producing business, how pictures were made, what a big task it was, and explained the company's system of bookings and keeping record of everything. He assured the exhibitors present that no stone would be left unturned by the local firm to give the very best service possible at all times. After the banquet more pictures were shown and there were more beverages until two o'clock in the morning. The Dutch lunch consisted of ice cream, cake and sandwiches. The visitors sat at one long table which had been attractively decorated with small candle lamps having colored shades.

On that same night the company opened a Toledo (Ohio) office at 428 Huron street, in charge of John R. Lakin, who for several months managed the Detroit office of the Pathe Company, in the Henry Smith building. The Detroit Kriterion Company has three floors, the first being for the general offices and examination of reels; the entire second for projection capable of comfortably seating 100 people, and the third floor is for advertising matter, posters, etc. Ralph Peckam, general manager, says that business so far has started out extremely good. He is planning on keeping "open house" on an average of once a month, or at least once every sixty days, giving an entire evening over to the entertainment of exhibitors so that they may become better acquainted with the Detroit Kriterion Company. The officers are Charles D. Wesch, treasurer; Ralph Peckham, general manager and secretary, and Otto Seestedt, president, all of Detroit.

Showed the Fight Films

Detroiters Had Chance to See Willard-Johnson Prize Fight Pictures at Monroe Theater on April 19—Authorities Made No Move to Suppress Them—Hundreds Stood in Front of Theater for Chance to See Show.

By Jacob Smith, Detroit Correspondent of Moving Picture World.

PICTURES from the Willard-Johnson fight at Havana were shown in the Monroe theater, 54 Monroe avenue, Detroit, despite the law. Hundreds of people stood in front of the theater on Monday, April 19, the first day, and seats were at a premium during the entire time that the pictures were on exhibition. No attempt was made by the police to stop them. A sign was conspicuously displayed before the theater announcing that "Jess Willard, the world's heavy-weight champion, is being shown inside." Nothing was said of the contest at Havana or of Johnson's part in the films. The scenes were authentic and copyrighted. They began with the weighing in of the men, close views of their faces and muscles, of the throngs, trainers and managers and the greetings the principals received on entering the ring. Scenes from about a dozen rounds were shown, winding up with the knockout, the counting of ten seconds, Johnson's attempt to rise, and the ovation for Willard at the hands of the thousands packed about the ringside. The pictures were enthusiastically applauded at all the shows.

ARTONE FILM COMPANY.

New Company May Come to Detroit—Will Picturize Songs.

Detroit is soon to become a film producing center owing to the advent into the field of the Artone Film Company, which promises the staging of large film productions in this vicinity before very long. Several cities are being considered for the erection of a large modern studio, the exact location to be announced in a few weeks. A new and novel way of picturizing popular songs is the main feature of this company, which will be in a position to provide theaters with a high class vocalist who will sing the very latest song hits while motion pictures are being shown on the screen descriptive of the song. The Artone Film Company is a $100,000 corporation, organized under the laws of the State of Michigan, with offices at 79 Woodward avenue. Williard H. Goodfellow is president, Louis B. Garson, lessee of the Broadway-Strand, feels very much encouraged over the first week's business, and says he is going to endeavor to give his patrons the very best feature pictures obtainable. The chimes in front of the theater announcing the beginning of shows is also a unique feature that is attracting considerable attention and comment. Starting with May 9 the Broadway-Strand will show first-run Metro pictures. "The Heart of Maryland" was the third attraction at that playhouse.

NEW SCREEN CLUB COMING?

Detroit may have a Screen Club, patterned after the New York idea. It is to consist of the live-wires of the moving picture industry who are located in Detroit. Membership will include exhibitors and exchange men, but will be limited to the "live-wires" only. The idea of forming such a club originated at the Arcadia, Thursday evening, April 15, during the progress of the motion picture exhibitors' ball. Should Detroit have such a club it will be for social purposes only and will not have any "business" attached thereto.

On the day in question electric lights were placed in front of the theater which read, "Richard Travers Himself."

PETER JEUP TESTING FIRE ALARM BOX ORDINANCE.

A city ordinance requires that theaters must be equipped with fire alarm boxes as a matter of protection and safety first in case of fire. This installation is quite expensive for the small theaters, and it is the contention of Peter Jeup, proprietor of the Luna theater, on St. Aubin avenue, that the ordinance does not include the small moving picture houses, so he has refused to install a fire alarm box, and the matter is now before the corporation counsel as a test case.

The fame of Atlanta as a center for the motion picture industry and supplies is becoming world wide. This week the Harry K. Kansas Censors at Work

Exchanges Serving Exhibitors in State Find No Fault with Manner of Censoring Film—Board Changes Its Decision When Newspapers and Public Opinion Protest—Busy Day Caused Confusion in Censoring.

Special to Moving Picture World from Kansas City News Service.

THE film exchanges in Kansas City are not worrying over the unfairness of the Kansas state censor law, and they are aiding the exhibitors and keeping their business alive. The law so far has been very kind to the film exchanges of Kansas City sending films in to that state, and taken altogether it is about as lenient as the Missouri censors that are only found in the larger cities. The price of $2 a picture is a little high, but few of the pictures have been cut at all, and only one has been refused admittance as a whole. The law in Kansas goes against the grain in application to the film exchange manager and the exhibitor in the fact that it is compulsory, and Missouri has no compulsory law. The only censors in the state are of civic organizations in large cities.

C. S. Edwards, Jr., district manager of the Pathe Exchange, says that so far his pictures have got by the censors in Kansas in good style and that not one of them has yet been cut. Mr. Edwards recently received a personal letter from W. D. Ross, head of the censorship of Kansas, congratulating him on the fine bunch of films that he has been sending into Kansas and calling attention to the fact that none of the Pathe pictures had had to be cut.

Marty Williams, manager of the Mutual Company here says that his films have been getting by the censors in fine shape and that he expects them to always do so, for he does not intend to send in any pictures that will have to be cut to pieces. Mr. Williams has also had praises on the fine bunch of "stuff" he has been sending into the State of Kansas.

The Universal Company has been getting their pictures by the censor without any difficulty at all, according to them. The company does not foresee any difficulty in placing all the pictures they produce in the State of Kansas without losing much of them by cutting.

The only trouble with the Kansas board of censors that has been had is that they recently got balled up on a rather busy day. Many films had been admitted without a cut being made, and the manager thought it was high time that some were being made. So he called his censors up on the carpet and impressed upon them that all barroom, cafe, cabaret, carousing, drunken, cutting, shooting scenes, etc., had to be eliminated. The young lady on the board of censors took the thing a little too much to heart, and she barred eight out of nineteen films that she reviewed that day belonging to one company. The newspapers and public made such a clamor at this that the censors thought better of their actions and they have asked that Kansas City concern to send the eight pictures back and that they will be passed.

PLAYS TENNIS WITH THEM.

L. A. Sheridan, traveling representative of the Pathe Company, was in the city recently. Mr. Sheridan brought in a great bunch of contracts for pictures. He also carried a tennis racquet and he claims that he uses it to influence some of the Missouri exhibitors to book his films. Sheridan can talk even while playing tennis, and he can do many other things at the same time he is talking. Maybe this is why his bookings are so good.

LETS OUT TENNIS COURTS.

Two partners named House and Seager recently purchased the Rex theater, at Higginsville, Mo., and then Mr. House sold his half interest to his partner. In the afternoon of the same day they got together again and Mr. House bought the entire theater himself. After the thing had been straightened out Mr. House announced that he had secured the Pathe film service or rather that they had secured him. He also announces that he is building tennis courts on vacant property on Main street, in Higginsville, which he will rent out by the hour during the summer.

KANSAS CITY NOTES.

Pictures shown in Kansas City are now being advertised as having been passed by the Kansas Board of Censorship and the sign has become almost as familiar as that of "passed by the National Board of Censorship." However, it is expected that the next month will find the sign at the head of nearly all the local pictures and it will pass as an endorsement in Missouri in this section of the country as well as in Kansas.

C. S. Edwards, Jr., has been very busy lately. The Kansas Board of Censorship piled a great amount of work up on him making arrangements for the censoring of his films. Mr. Edwards says that the bookings still continue to come in heaps from Kansas and in piles from Missouri.

F. F. Nine, of the Pathe Company, was so busy that he at last got his assistant to help him with the work. He says that he has it on Mr. Edwards now, for he gets to eat dinner on Saturdays and most of the time Mr. Edwards don't—he's so busy. There is a great amount of team work done by these two men at the office, and they clean up a pile of work in a short while, but always there is a larger pile waiting for them to do after they have finished one.

The Tenth Street theater, in Kansas City, got the first chance at the latest Pathe serial feature, "Who Pays," and they ran it last Saturday and Sunday. The picture made a big hit at the theater. The press has been praising the picture in its comments. The management of the house expects to have it filled to capacity every time that an episode is placed on the bill.

J. J. Brown, of the Pathe Company, went to Lawrence, Kas., with his camera, recently, to take the pictures of the breaking of "Black Devil," which was heralded as the fiercest man-eating horse in captivity. The fact is that Black Devil put up no fight at all and allowed himself to be driven about the ring like an old driving horse. Prof. O. S. Gleason did not add much to his fame by the performance.

The General Film Company, in Kansas City, has remodeled its offices on the second floor of the Ozark building. It had to be done to gain more space that the growth of the business demanded. The desks have been changed about to give more room and the arrangement now gives it to the office without giving the appearance of being cramped.

A jury in Judge Burney's division of the Circuit Court at Kansas City recently awarded a verdict of $5,000 to Mrs. Mina M. Oakley against the Wonderland theater, 121 East Twelfth street. Mrs. Oakley stumbled in the theater Nov. 19, 1912, and became crippled from the fall.

George A. Schumacher, to whose skill in wood carving the Willis Wood theater owes much of its beauty, died in Kansas City at the home of his daughter, Mrs. Bernard J. Harvey. He was 77 years old. Mr. Schumacher was an expert in wood carving as is well shown by the beautifulness of the designs of the Willis Wood theater.

Use of Film in Schools

California Teachers' Association Goes on Record as Favoring Moving Pictures in Schools—Boston Teacher Calls Show "the Great Public School of the Country" —Educators Want State to Establish Film Library to Distribute Pictures.

By T. A. Church, San Francisco Correspondent of Moving Picture World.

THE forty-eighth annual meeting of the bay section of the California Teachers' Association ended recently after a week of sessions at the Civic Auditorium, San Francisco. During this meeting scarcely a session passed without a discussion in regard to the bill now before the State Legislature designed to add a department of visual instruction to the State Board of Education and to arrange for the showing of moving pictures in all of the schools of the state. This representative body of teachers went on record as favoring the use of moving pictures in schools and urged that the special department be created as planned.

At the closing session of the gathering Miss Mae Schreiber, of Boston, addressed the teachers on the value of moving pictures in the education of both the child and the adult, her talk being illustrated by moving pictures showing the action of water, ice and snow, and portraying plant development. She declared that moving picture houses to-day constitute the great public school of this country and called attention to the fact that the things we see create a much more lasting impression than those we merely hear about. She spoke of her subject from a practical standpoint, having for a year been connected with a large firm in New York that makes a specialty of producing educational films. She warned the teachers that in depicting films of crime, the just punishment must also be included, in order to convey the impression that no crime can go unpunished.

The teachers attending the convention reported that practically all of the new schools being erected are being fitted for moving pictures, and that the old ones are being remodeled for this purpose. The only drawback at the present time to the extensive use of pictures in education is the cost of film rental and the difficulty in securing the subjects desired. These are set forth as the leading reasons why the state should establish a film library and supply subjects free of charge, as in the case of text books.

IMPERIAL CHANGES HANDS.

Grauman's Imperial theater, on Market street, near Seventh, erected several years ago for D. J. Grauman and conducted by him as a high class moving picture house since that time, has been disposed of to an Eastern syndicate known as the Chicago and San Francisco Amusement Co., headed by I. de Jongh. The new owners plan to make a number of changes in the house costing several thousand dollars, but these will be made without interfering with business. They also contemplate taking over two other houses in this city, but the deals for the transfer of these have not been completed. The Imperial theater will be conducted under the management of J. A. Partington, who formerly acted in this capacity for D. J. Grauman, and who is recognized as one of the best judges of moving pictures on the coast. Mr. Grauman states that his retirement from the Imperial is due to the fact that he has other projects under way which demand his attention, including the erection of a theater at Eddy and Mason streets.

The Turner & Dahnken Circuit has booked the "Eternal City" for a two weeks' run at the Tivoli theater, commencing May 16, at a price said to be a record one for this territory. The attraction is now being advertised at prices ranging from 25 cents to 50 cents.

METCALF MOVES TO FILM ROW.

G. A. Metcalfe, now located on Eddy streets, has made arrangements to move his supply house to 115-119 Golden Gate avenue, early in May. The new location is in the Film Exchange Building and is between the quarters of the California Film Exchange, Inc., and the Kriterion Film Exchange. The change is being made because of the need for more room, the quarters being vacated being entirely inadequate. A large projection room will be fitted up in the basement and it is planned to have two machines of each make carried on display on the main floor.

TENNESSEE ITEMS.

O. W. Lamb, of the Paragon Feature Film Company, has completed picture taking at Memphis, Tenn., and the films have been sent to New York, where they will be developed and returned to Memphis in time to be shown during the early part of May. The pictures were taken under the auspices of the Business Men's Club of Memphis. The club offered $20 in gold for the best title to the pictures. More than 3,000 titles were suggested. "Cotton Bolls and Wedding Bells" has been suggested by Mrs. Beatrice Greer, and is declared by Director Lamb to be the best suggestion received, as it smacks of the South and has enough romance in it to be appealing.

A large advance sale of tickets for the Boy Scout pictures made in Chattanooga and exhibited at the Auditorium was experienced. These pictures were posed by the Chattanooga scouts and other local people from a scenario prepared by local people. The pictures were shown on April 22, 23 and 24 and good crowds attended every performance. The showings were delayed somewhat, as special pictures to accompany them could not be obtained on the dates at first set.

Nashville's Parthenon

New Moving Picture Theater on Church Street Nearly Completed—Has Many Columns—Seats Only 600, but Is Most Complete and Comfortable—Its Motto Is "Safety First"—Who Are Behind It.

By G. Crain, Jr., Chattanooga Correspondent of Moving Picture World.

THE Parthenon theater, at Nashville, Tenn., a new motion picture house which is under course of construction on Church street, will be ready for its formal opening in about four weeks. The theater will be operated by the Parthenon Amusement Company. C. Ira Lamb is president; H. L. Lamb, vice-president, and C. A. Bowman, Jr., secretary-treasurer. The board of directors is composed of J. W. Patrick, Dr. Charles Brower, Floyd Elliott and W. C. Cryer. Among others interested in the new theater are: Count Boys, L. G. Moses, Eugene Boykin, Albert S. Britt, Hamilton Love and Frank Farris. The Parthenon will have a seating capacity of only about 600 people, but will be one of the most complete theaters in the South. "Safety First" has been carefully considered in erecting the theater and large exits have been placed on each side. No buildings obstruct these exits and the theater can be emptied in a very few moments. The entire structure is fireproof. A number of large, natural ventilators will be built into the walls at frequent intervals. The Parthenon effect will be reproduced to some extent in the liberal use of large columns. These columns will support the box office and will also be used in the main lobby. The walls and ceilings of the interior will be decorated with hand paintings. Mr. Lamb has stated that arrangements have been closed for a superior film service, and only high grade films will be shown.

CHATTANOOGA VAUDEVILLE HOUSE ADOPTS PICTURES

Majestic Theater Leased by Graham, of Quality Way Syndicate, as Picture House.

Howell Graham, of Chattanooga, Tenn., has leased the Majestic, a vaudeville house, and will shortly convert it into a motion picture theater. For a time, at least, this not only means the passing of the Majestic, but also of vaudeville attractions in Chattanooga. The theater will continue with vaudeville shows until May 10, when it will be closed and shortly afterward reopened as a moving picture house. The management is contemplating changing the name to the "Metro" or some other name. It will be the fifth member of the "Quality Way" syndicate of Chattanooga motion picture theaters. Merger of the Majestic with the Quality Way syndicate created considerable surprise in Chattanooga when the news came from Nashville. The deal was closed in the capital city with H. F. Sperry and Mr. Brock after previous negotiations with Chattanooga directors of the Tennessee Amusement & Leasing Company. Mr. Graham on returning from Nashville confirmed the report of the deal and had something to say regarding plans for the future operation of the Majestic. The theater will be remodeled somewhat to meet moving picture requirements and a large mechanical orchestra will be installed. The shows will run one hour and thirty minutes each on regular schedules. Among films to be shown at the theater will be the George Kleine attractions, Mutual "masterpiece" series, General Film Company's feature releases, and exclusive Box Office Attraction releases. Ten cents will be charged for the lower floor seats and five cents for balcony seats. Mr. Graham announced that he became interested in leasing the Majestic as he had exclusive options on a number of large features which could not be profitably shown before audiences at the Crescent, Colonial, Alhambra and Theato houses because of the limited seating capacity of these theaters. While the Majestic is technically leased by Mr. Graham as an individual, the lease will be assumed by the company controlling the Quality Way theaters, of which Mr. Graham is general manager. He is also a director in the Tennessee Amusement & Leasing Company. Among others are Richard Watkins and N. Thayer Montague. While the Majestic as a vaudeville house was formerly a profitable theater, of late it has been losing money at the rate of $100 to $150 per week, while at the same time the motion picture theaters have been showing an increased business.

WITH THE ESSANAY PLAYERS AT SIGNAL MOUNTAIN.

The Essanay Film Manufacturing Company is getting along nicely with its picture making at the recently established camp on Signal Mountain, near Chattanooga, Tenn. The Tennessee people in the district are showing true Southern hospitality in many friendly ways, and are helping the producers in their efforts to stage feature films in the vicinity of Chattanooga. Capt. E. H. Calvert, of the film company, recently made arrangements with Judge McReynolds for the use of one of the court rooms in producing a trial. Judge McReynolds presided at the trial and also made arrangements for furnishing the clerk, jury, and other court attaches. Mrs. John Marshall Slaton, wife of the Governor of Georgia, was one of the distinguished visitors present while the film "A Lesson in Romance" was being made. This story is one taken in a gypsy camp. Fine weather is helping the producers considerably and the work is coming along rapidly.

VENDOME OPENED WITH FILMS.

The Vendome, of Nashville, the management of which recently announced that it would be turned into a moving picture theater, has completed all improvements and was formally opened on April 14 at noon. The carpenters and decorators worked overtime in getting the big playhouse in readiness for its debut into the moving picture world. The screen installed on the large stage is the largest in the city. The first picture shown at the theater was Ethel Barrymore in "The Nightingale."

STAHLER VISITS NASHVILLE.

H. E. Stahler, manager of the Atlanta office of the World Film Corporation, of New York, was recently in Nashville, Tenn., where he visited the management of the Strand. Mr. Stahler takes care of the entire Southern territory for the big feature company. He has made arrangements whereby the Clara Kimball Young production of "Hearts in Exile" will be shown at the Orpheum during the latter half of the theater's opening week, which starts on April 26 with "The Clemenceau Case," which will be shown for three days. Mr. Stahler is very much interested in the company's new play, "Lily of Poverty Flat," which was recently completed in California. This film will be shown at the Orpheum on May 3, 4 and 5.

TENNESSEE NOTES.

Joseph & Joseph, Louisville architects, who are rebuilding the Lillian theater at Clarksville, Tenn., which was burned about the first of the year, are getting along nicely on the new theater, which will be far handsomer than the old one. This will be the thirty-seventh moving picture house that the Joseph & Joseph concern has built. It will be some time yet before the house will be ready to open, but in the meantime the shows are being given at the Elite theater.

Pictures at Hippodrome

St. Louis' Big Vaudeville Theater Has Changed Hands—Will Now Show Feature Films Exclusively—Alf. V. Oldham Will Manage House and a Metro Program, Once a Week Change, Will Be the New Policy.

By A. H. Giebler, St. Louis Correspondent of Moving Picture World.

THE Hippodrome at 6th and Walnut streets, has passed under new management and hereafter will show only high grade moving pictures of the five and six-reel feature variety. The Hippodrome, which is one of the largest capacity houses in St. Louis, opened five years ago as a vaudeville and picture house, with a decided preference to vaudeville, with an admission scale of ten, twenty and twenty-five cents. The wide advertising given this house by its builder and first manager, Frank Talbot, has caused it to be as well known to people living in nearby towns as to residents of St. Louis, the immense popularity of the Hippodrome has been phenomenal and its conversion to moving pictures speaks volumes for the wide appeal of the silent drama.

Alf. V. Oldham, the new manager of the Hippodrome, is from Louisville, Ky., where he is well known in amusement circles from his connection with the Woodland Amusement Company and many other theatrical enterprises. Manager Oldham followed in the lead of the New York Hippodrome in the matter of his first week's booking, and will open the house with Mrs. Leslie Carter in "The Heart of Maryland." The Metro program will be used and each feature will be run a week solid. A shadow box and a Minusa gold fiber screen has been put in the Hippodrome and the house will be kept open all through the summer months.

KING BEE THEATER OPENS.

St. Louis' New 1,200-Seat Theater Has Apartments in Place of Balcony.

The King Bee theater, at Jefferson avenue and Howard street, opened to the public on April 18. Michael Nash, the owner and manager, operated a canvas-topped theater next door to the house which will be wrecked to make room for an airdome that will be used during the hot weather.

The King Bee, which seats 1,200 persons, and is modern and up to date in every way, is built on the theater-apartment idea, like the Mogler of St. Louis. A suite of six living rooms takes the place usually occupied by a balcony. This is the second theater built on this plan to open during the last two months. The King Bee has an especially large stage, completely fitted up with scenery, and the lighting effects of the auditorium are very fine. The illumination is furnished by a row of ceiling electric globes that extend from the stage to the front of the house.

The theater is owned by Mr. Nash and cost $35,000 to build, and stands as a monument to his good management of the small theater where he started in. Mr. Nash is well known in amusement circles throughout this district and is one of the pioneer picture men of St. Louis.

A program of all pictures will be used with the exception of Sunday, when vaudeville will be added.

LEAH BAIRD IN ST. LOUIS.

Miss Leah Baird, the Vitagraph star, who in private life is the better half of manager Beck, of the Universal Exchange, and who is a native St. Louisan, visited the old home town recently, and while here appeared at a number of theaters and gave her many admirers a chance to see her in person. She attracted great crowds, and the clever little talk that she made and the beautiful gowns she wore, made a decided hit with the audiences wherever she went. Miss Baird had the misfortune to be ill while she was here and was forced to abandon a trip to the Universal City opening at Los Angeles that she has planned to take with her husband.

ST. LOUIS BRIEF NOTES.

Moving pictures are to be taken of the Boy Scouts' first-aid-to-the-injured competition to be held in Forest Park on May 22. This competition is to become an annual event, and of the seventy-six troops now entered for the contest, there will be eight members of each troop in the grand contest.

The Famous-Barr Company, one of the largest department stores in St. Louis, is giving two free moving picture shows daily, at 3 and 4:15 p. m. The hours are purposely arranged so as to allow school children the privilege of seeing the exhibitions. A Pathoscope is used, and the films are mostly patriotic and educational, as well as interesting and entertaining. The store boasts a very handsome recital hall in which the pictures are shown, and the large audiences attending the exhibitions are ample proof of the popularity of the entertainment.

A two-story theater and office building, to cost $8,000, is being built by the Halve Investment Company at 5847-55 Delmar Boulevard.

The St. Louis Times, an evening daily, is giving away ten Pathoscopes to the ten schools in St. Louis, obtaining the largest number of votes in a contest started with the idea of getting more subscribers for the paper.

The California Airdome, California avenue and Sidney street, will open on the second Sunday in May with an all picture bill of strictly high-class photoplays. Last year the California used vaudeville and pictures, but owing to many of the patrons requesting from the management more pictures, the decision was made to run all pictures, with possibly many long features.

A new airdome is to be erected by the Melba Amusement Company at the southeast corner of Grand avenue and Miami street. The airdome is to be completed and opened by May 1. A large theater and office building is to be built later, so as to be ready for occupancy in the fall. The building will cost about $100,000 and is in a section of the city that has developed into an active business center in the last few years. William C. Neubauer is president of the Melba Amusement Company.

(Special to Moving Picture World from Pittsburgh News Service.)

THE Vitagraph Company of America, Lubin Film Manufacturing Company, Selig Polyscope Company and Essanay Film Manufacturing Company which have finally and officially launched a big new feature exchange combination in New York and applied for a charter of incorporation with a capital stock of $500,000 for a company to be known as the Vitagraph-Lubin-Selig-Essanay Motion Picture Company, will shortly open offices in Pittsburgh, Pa. The location has not been decided upon yet, but Philip Adler, recently of Philadelphia, and formerly of Pittsburgh, will have charge of the local offices. PARAMOUNT EXCHANGE IN ITS NEW BUILDING.

The Famous Players Film Service, Inc., distributors of the Paramount pictures in western Pennsylvania, Ohio, West Virginia and Kentucky, are now located in their new five-story, fireproof building at the corner of Penn avenue and Twelfth street, Pittsburgh, Pa. This building has a floor space of 12,000 square feet and is the largest and most complete film exchange in the United States. James Steele is the general manager of this company.

The new quarters, besides being commodious, are light, airy and perfectly sanitary, advantages which are usually lacking in the average film exchange. While business is going on as usual the new quarters are not nearly completed and many improvements are yet to be made.

PITTSBURGH BRIEFS.

The Empire and the Olympic moving picture theaters, in Connellsville, Pa., were sold last week by the Deputy Sheriff of Uniontown to Frederick Robbins, at suit of F. C. Conway for unpaid rent amounting to $970. Mr. Robbins says he will remodel and repair these houses at once. He also conducts the Swisson theater, in this city.

J. H. Dietz, manager of the Grand, at Kittanning, Pa., announces that he will open the summer season of pictures April 19. Paramount productions will be used.

J. M. Miles, a prominent business man of Altoona, Pa., has leased from the Pennsylvania Railroad Company a plot of ground at Eleventh avenue and Fifteenth street, Pittsburgh, for ten years, on which he will erect a moving picture theater costing $65,000. This house will have a seating capacity of 1,200 and will be up to date in every respect. It is expected to have it ready to open about September 1.

James Steele, general manager of the Pittsburgh and Chicago offices of the Famous Players Film Service and vice-president of the Paramount Pictures Corporation, was in New York last week attending a directors' meeting of that corporation.

G. R. Ainsworth, formerly road man for the Fox Film Corporation, has resigned from that company and is now with the Continental Feature Film Company, of Pittsburgh, Pa., and will have charge of "The Diamond in the Sky," the new serial.

Mayer Silverman, of the Liberty Film Renting Company, Pittsburgh, Pa., announces that he is establishing branches in various parts of the western Pennsylvania and West Virginia and is appointing district agents to handle his motion picture accessories and films. Locations of the various branches have not yet been announced.

The Anton theater in Monongahela City, near Pittsburgh, Pa., has passed into new management and is under the management of George Moore, of Monessen and Jules Collins of Monongahela. It is owned by the Ideal Photo Play Company, of which Tom B. Cowan is the head. Messrs. Moore and Collins take over the stock owned by Henry Louttit. Mr. Louttit retired from the firm as does also his son Harry, who has been in charge of the playhouse. The new management is arranging for several important changes in the policy and operation of the theater.

H. B. Kester, proprietor of the East

Liberty Cameraphone, Pittsburgh, Pa., and president of the Pittsburgh Screen Club, announces that he will charge 20 cents admission on "The Clemenceau Case," Mr. Kester was the pioneer in the advance to 10 cents, not only in East Liberty, but in Pittsburgh, and he shows commendable courage by taking his present step.

Architect Thomas Hanna began taking bids last week for the putting up of a $20,000 motion picture theater at Ambridge, near Pittsburgh, Pa., for Col. T. J. Keenan. This house will have a seating capacity of 600 and will be one of the best between Pittsburgh and Cleveland.

H. J. Manery, proprietor and manager of the Oxford, in Morgan, Pa., opened that house last week with a ten cent admission charge daily. This house is a $10,000 proposition and has a seating capacity of 500. Mr. Manery is an old exhibitor, having conducted houses in Glassport and Elizabeth six years ago.

The management of the Coliseum at New Castle, Pa., has announced that starting this week they will start showing moving pictures on a large scale and discontinue vaudeville for the summer season.

Arrangements have practically been completed to show the best in motion pictures on a gigantic scale.

NOT MUCH CHEAP ADVERTISING.

The old time "barker" who a few years ago was considered an absolute necessity in the lobby of the moving picture show house, has practically disappeared in Louisville. One or two of the smaller theaters, of the five-cent type, are still employing doormen who act as ushers and bark for the show. However, the moving picture industry has come up so rapidly that cheap advertising is no longer taking seriously, and as a rule the theaters with a barker are the ones that offer only mediocre programs. The average person has come around to a point where he condemns the house with a barker as a cheap, dirty, ill-smelling playhouse, and gives it a wide berth.

LUTZ BALL PARK AN AIRDOME ON CLEAR NIGHTS.

It has just been announced that Less Thurman, who is connected with the Masonic theater, is interested in a plan whereby an airdome will be operated at the old Lutz ball park at Clay and Kentucky streets this season. It is planned to use the park as a ball park during the day, and on Sundays, but to show vaudeville sketches and moving pictures at night. A number of other airdomes are promised in various sections of the city and it looks as though this branch of the motion picture business will be very active during the season.

NEW OWNER OF PEARL THEATER DIES.

C. Jacobs, of Carrollton, Ky., who recently purchased the Pearl theater on Walnut street, and who announced that he would operate it as a moving picture theater, died in Louisville recently and the remains were sent to his home at Carrollton for interment. After purchasing the theater Mr. Jacobs made a short trip to his home and on the way back took a cold on the train which resulted in pneumonia. He died just three days after purchasing the theater. It has not been announced what will be done with the property.

SHELDON TO OWN EXCHANGE.

Fred Sheldon, formerly secretary-treasurer of the S. & P. Film & Supply Company, has leased the second and third floors over the Novelty theater, and will shortly open up a film office of his own. He will handle the Kriterion program, but the office will be his instead of the Kriterion Company's as was recently announced. These quarters were occupied by the Central Film Exchange at the time that R. S. Shrader, now of Indianapolis, was in charge of that company's local office.

A Paying Advertisement

Louis Dittmar of Majestic Amusement Company, Louisville, Boosts Picture House on Program Page of High Class Legitimate Theater, the Macauley—Finds That It Pays—Films Attract the $2 Audiences.

By G. D. Crain, Jr., Louisville Correspondent of Moving Picture World.

LOUIS DITTMAR, head of the Majestic Amusement Company, of Louisville, has an advertising plan, novel, but at the same time excellent, which is used in the winter months while the legitimate theaters are in operation. For instance, Macauley's theater, of Louisville, is one of the oldest and highest priced legitimate theaters in the entire South and shows only $1.50 or $2 shows during its regular season. Mr. Dittmar uses a full page advertisement in the program of this theater in which he announces the bill being shown at the Majestic theater at the time and also the bill to be shown during immediately following dates. Mr. Dittmar shows the Paramount program. The idea of using one theater's program to advertise another theater is certainly novel, but at the same time a great many persons who see a $2 show tonight will go to a ten-cent picture show the next night. Therefore the shows do not conflict in any way, and many persons see the advertisement and get interested in picture show between acts. The Majestic advertises as, "The House of Feature Films," and lives up to its reputation by showing very little else.

That a legitimate theater will draw good crowds to picture performances was shown on Sunday, April 18, at Macauley's theater in Louisville when the Universal Film Company's great Submarine pictures were on exhibit at the famous old playhouse. The theater has run out its season of regular performances and Col. John T. Macauley decided to allow moving pictures to be shown. The day was a exceptionally good one and a big matinee was present. The house was packed at night and its was with difficulty that the management could accommodate the evening crowds. According to one of the men interested in showing the pictures, all that is necessary to get a good crowd in any theater is to deliver the goods. Business with all of the motion picture playhouses of Louisville has shown a decided tendency toward the better during the past few weeks. Weather conditions have been excellent and both afternoon and night shows are drawing good crowds. The hard winter is over and the number of unemployed in Louisville is down to a minimum. The outskirt theaters are also doing better business than for some time.

"Billy," a Story by a Louisvillan, Played by Many of City's Smart Set.

Considerable interest is being developed in Louisville in a photoplay called "Billy," which has just been produced by Ernest Carpenter, of the firm of Carpenter & Johnson, local camera men. Mrs. Ella Hutchison Ellwanger wrote the book about a year ago and she and Joseph Monaghan, an instructor in scenario writing at the Louisville Y. M. C. A., prepared the scenario from the book for the play. This play was produced by Louisville society people and will be an unusually attractive and handsome affair. Mr. Hewett Brown, who owns a palatial residence at the entrance of Cherokee Park, consented to permit his home to be used in setting a number of the scenes in the photoplay, and his six-year-old step-son, Brainard Averitt Lemon, took the principal part, "Billy." The boy is unusually intelligent for his years and carried out his part to perfection. Mr. Carpenter directed the entire production besides doing his own camera work. About sixty persons took part in producing the films which will be shown on the screen at Keith's sometime in May. It is entirely a children's production and will be shown in various cities in connection with the special children's pictures which are becoming so popular in many sections. A birthday party and a sand dance in which over thirty children participate are two of the principal scenes. All flowers, animals and other properties in the production were real and no artificial material or stage "props" were used.

BETTER ATTENDANCE AT THE CHILDREN'S PROGRAMS.

Lee Goldberg, manager of the Mary Anderson theater, a Keith house which is showing nothing but moving pictures, said that the attendances at the Saturday morning shows for children were improving steadily, which is largely due to improved weather conditions. The theater will continue showing pictures throughout the entire summer, but it has not been decided whether the children's special performances will be continued after the vacation season starts or not. It is not likely that the children would support the shows after vacation really starts and the shows may be discontinued until the school season starts again. So far there has been no large profit in handling the children's shows, due to small attendances and the cost of having the films shipped backward and forward. It has been necessary to have the films sent in and shown to the censorship board and either held or shipped back until the date arrived on which the films were to be shown. They are generally shown to the censors about two or three weeks in advance at the Masonic or some other theater that is not operating daily.

STOCK COMPANY BUYS TWO THEATERS.

A stock company, composed of Paris and Louisville, Ky., capitalists, and to be known as the Dixie Theater Company, have purchased the Princess theater of Paris, Tenn., from Buckner & Ezell, and the Dixie theater from O. C. Jackson and assumed control of both properties at the close of business Saturday, April 17, 1915. The Princess will be an exclusive picture show, while the Dixie will be for road shows and pictures also. The new management also plans to equip an airdome on a prominent location in Paris and begin operations not later than June 1. Pictures, and occasionally vaudeville, will be the offering at the airdome. The affairs of the new company will be directed by Mr. C. V. Ezell, as managing director, and Mr. D. I. Martin, manager and publicity man. Paris has a population of 6,000, is a good show town, and the new company starts out with exceedingly bright prospects for a prosperous future.

Mr. O. C. Jackson, retiring manager of the Dixie theater, and wife will in the near future leave for Los Angeles, Universal City and other California and Western points on a visit, and it is understood that while in the West Mr. Jackson will look over some business propositions that have been offered him. Mr. and Mrs. Jackson's friends in this city, whom they number by the thousand, will regret to lose such good citizens from amongst us.

The Lyric theater, at Jackson, Ky., has been incorporated with a capital stock of $4,000. The incorporators are Ollie N. Pollard, Green Haddix and O. H. Pollard. The theater will be operated as a moving picture house.

Five or Ten Cents

Harrisburg Moving Picture Men Disturbed Because Palace Theater Reduces Its Price and the Photoplay Follows Suit—Cut Is Said to Be Reply to Eight-Reel Programs—Wholesome Agreement Between Theaters May Result.

Special to Moving Picture World from Philadelphia News Service.

Great is the commotion in the moving picture industry in Harrisburg. A lively rate war is being waged among the managers of local moving picture theaters. This commotion has all been caused by the fact that Mr. Kline, newly appointed manager of the Palace theater, has reduced the price of admission to five cents. The Photoplay theater immediately followed suit.

Proprietors of other moving picture theaters are at a loss as to what action to pursue. They agree unanimously in declaring that they are unable to make any profit in conducting a first-class show at an admission of five cents. Peter Magaro, manager of the Regent, recently declared that no theater could, for one jitney, show the same quality film as are shown in his theater and make money. Mr. Magaro continued his conversation and remarked that he is selling five cent seats in the gallery of his theater in order to meet the competition, but that the seats on the ground floor remain at the same price.

The manager of the Photoplay, where the price has been reduced to five cents, declare that he is maintaining a high class of shows and that he made the cut in order to meet competition. He intimated that this low price of admission may only be of a temporary nature.

The manager of the Palace, the boy that started all of the trouble, stated that he is making money by selling tickets of admission for five cents. On Saturday evenings and on special occasions he charges ten cents. He declared that he would have been willing to maintain an admission of ten cents if the other managers had agreed to show no more than six reels a day, but, he says they refused to do that and were showing as many as eight reels per diem. Then, he remarked, he came forward with the five cent price of admission.

ATLANTIC CITY SHOWS KEEP OPEN ON SUNDAY

May Result in Church People Petitioning for Recall of City Officials.

Director of Public Safety, of Atlantic City, N. J., William Bartlett, has evidently refused to grant the demand of the Law Enforcement League, of which league Rev. Henry Mellen, pastor of the First Presbyterian church, is the head, that he close the moving picture shows and stop the amusements on the piers on Sunday, as all of the above mentioned places were wide open on Sunday last. The threat was made that unless he used his police power to close these places action would be taken to compel him to obey the Sunday laws.

The inaction of Director Bartlett may bring about petitions to have him recalled along with Mayor Riddle, whom the league intends to compel to go to the polls with his issue of a wide-open Sunday. Riddle recalls have appeared. Opinion as to the popularity of the Mayor is divided but the general view is that if the recall is based on the issue for closed picture shows and a stricter enforcement of the Sunday laws, Riddle will win out.

WILLARD-JOHNSON SLIDES.

Although it is unlikely that the moving pictures of the Willard-Johnson championship bout will be shown in the United States, Trenton fistic "fans" will have the opportunity of seeing twenty illustrated slides of the most important stages of the big battle. Manager Wahn, of the State street theater, after considerable trouble and expense, secured the pictures for his playhouse and will show them for some time at his theater.

The pictures show very plainly the story of the victory. They were taken at the ringside by experts, being snapped at the times when either of the participants sent home a telling punch.

PICTURES ENTERTAIN TRENTON CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

The Trenton Chamber of Commerce recently held one of the greatest meetings in the history of the organization, at the Masonic Temple. One of the real treats of the evening was the exhibiting of several reels of moving pictures depicting some of the leading industries of that place. Some of the pictures were shown before and others after the luncheon which served to pacify the hunger of the members in attendance. Mayor Donnelly, of Trenton, President Haverstick, of the Chamber of Commerce, and John E. Gill were among the prominent speakers of the occasion. It may be noted here that when a body of men like those included on the membership roll of the Chamber of Commerce, deem it satisfactory to include moving pictures in meetings of their organization, it proves conclusively that the art of moving pictures has reached a stage bordering on perfection.

OPERATORS IN PHILADELPHIA GIVE A BALL.

The annual ball of the Philadelphia Motion Picture Operators' Local, No. 307, was recently held in Musical Fund Hall. Many prominent members of the moving picture profession were in attendance and the affair was voted a huge success. Crane Wilbur and Cecelia Stanton led the grand march. S. Lubin was included among the guests of honor. Large delegations were present from the Lubin, Vitagraph and Edison companies. Those in charge of the affair certainly fulfilled their offices to the greatest possible extent and the wonderful success of the ball can be traced directly to these Goliaths.

The publicity committee consisted of B. F. Bache, chairman; Lou Krouse, Abbot Oliver, W. G. Murray; the arrangement committee of Joseph V. Freil, Charles Smith and Edwin McCall, and the refreshment committee of William Friedman, Robert Taylor and Clement Rizzo.

CRITICS ENTERTAIN LUBIN.

S. Lubin, the moving picture manufacturer, was recently the guest of honor at a dinner given at the Hotel Majestic by the Critics' Association. George Rogers, president of the association, acted as toastmaster. Mr. Lubin rendered an excellent talk on the growth of the motion picture industry and the great future which is open to this particular line of endeavor. Among others present were Clay M. Greene, a playwright, and J. Allen Boone, both associated with the Lubin studios.

GIVE TICKETS THROUGH CITY DIRECTORY.

The names of fifty-two persons are taken each day from the city directory of Atlantic City, N. J., and are promiscuously placed among the want ads of a daily Atlantic City paper. Two of these names will be marked by a star in front of them and the owners of these two names are entitled to two seats each at either the Apollo or New Nixon theaters at the option of the first claimant. The remaining fifty names are entitled to two tickets each at any one of the below named theaters: Central, Criterion, Cosy, Liberty and the Royal. The people of this seashore city have been greatly interested in the affair and the daily paper is eagerly scanned to see if the reader's name is among the lucky fifty-two.

NEW BIG HOUSE IN READING.

One of the largest real estate deals during the last several years that have been transacted in Reading, Pa., was recently consummated, involving a total cost of $125,000, in which the old Academy building, 533-535 Penn street, the property of Frank P. Lauer, has been leased for a long term of years to a newly formed company which proposes erecting a modern motion picture theater on the site.

Edward Z. Scholl, architect, who acted for Constantine X. Mantis, proprietor of the Crystal restaurant, and who will manage the new company, would not divulge the details of the transaction.

It is undertood that the new company proposes erecting one of the most beautiful theatres in the State of Pennsylvania. The site is admirably situated for such a purpose and when the structure is completed it will be the only amusement house on Penn square. When the building, now occupying the site is torn down there will be a space 42 by 150 feet on which to build. Work on the new structure may commence in a short time if the present tenants agree to vacate. The plans for the theater are now in the course of completion.

WHERE TO VOTE IN UNIVERSAL BEAUTY CONTEST.

Great interest has been aroused by the announcement of the Beauty Contest arranged by the Universal Film Company, whereby the two successful competitors will go, free of charge, to the Panama-Pacific and San Diego Expositions and at the same time enjoy a trip de luxe to the Pacific coast. Theaters every where are taking up the contest. Below is a list of the local theaters where coupons for the contest may be voted:

Fifty-eighth Street Theater, Fifty-eighth street and Woodlawn avenue.

Rex Theater, Mascher and Somerset streets.

Grand Theater, Fifty-second and Market streets.

Ontario Theater, Second and Ontario streets.

Cohocksink Theater, Germantown avenue and Diamond street.

Overbrook Theater, Sixty-third and Haverford avenue.

Cayuga Theater, Germantown avenue and Cayuga street.

Star Theater, Thirty-first and Wharton streets.

Victor Theatre, Franklin and Clearfield streets.

Brunswick Palace, Frankford and Norris streets.

Kriterion Theater, Forty-sixth street and Lancaster avenue.

The Evening Telegraph is printing coupons which are good for votes at the above named theaters.

PHILADELPHIA BRIEFS.

Sauer and Hahn, architects, announce that they are almost ready for bids for the new theater, southwest corner of 31st and Wilt streets, to be erected for the Northwest Reality Company. The new structure is to be one-story in height, brick, concrete and terra-cotta, 44 by 124 feet.

Announcement has been made of the installation of a ten thousand dollar Wurlitzer organ in the Girard avenue theater. Commencing in a short time a new policy for the spring and summer season will be started at this theater. This new policy will be a new line of photoplays of the highest class obtainable.

Manager Wood, of the Pastime at State College, Pa., has just completed enlarging and improving the stage of his popular playhouse and will in the future devote a part of his daily program to refined vaudeville.

THE UTAH MAY SHOW PICTURES.

By H. W. Pickering, Salt Lake Correspondent of Moving Picture World.

WHETHER the Utah theater will be permanently devoted to the exhibition of motion pictures or whether it will be reopened as a stock theater is a question still hanging in the air. It is understood that the control of the house had passed into the hands of C. E. Taylor, a local real estate man, but it has not been definitely decided whether he will line up with the film business or will endeavor to re-establish the popularity of the State street house as the home of stock dramatic productions.

During the past few months, while the somewhat tangled affairs of the house were being straightened out, there have been occasional showings of feature pictures and once in awhile a travelogue. In the local theatrical field, the Utah has had the lead as the theater with its "ups and downs." It was built by the Orpheum Circuit and was the vaudeville house for many years. After that, several very successful stock companies occupied it, but motion pictures and other attractions caused the companies last engaged to abandon what they considered a hopeless task. If the Utah becomes a motion picture theater it will have an excellent location and is well equipped for housing large audiences.

MIDGLEY VISITS SALT LAKE.

C. W. Midgley, who built the big Liberty and American theaters in Salt Lake and who was the first manager of those houses, returned to Salt Lake this week on a business visit. Mr. Midgley is now manager of a large motion picture theater in Oakland, Cal., in the management of which he is asisted by his son, Rex Midgley. According to Mr. Midgley, the Panama-Pacific Exposition has somewhat affected the busines of San Francisco exhibitors but has not caused much of a panic on the Oakland side of the bay.

SALT LAKE CITY BRIEFS.

L. A. Cahill, a local newspaper man, has landed in the job of traveling representative for the Mutual Film Corporation of Utah, the local branch of the Mutual, and started his first swing around the intermountain circuit April 19.

When the war broke out, the metal market was considerably affected, and it was felt keenly in the mountain mining camps of this state, among them the little mining settlement of Robinson, Utah. The closing down of the mines in the Mammoth district caused the temporary closing of the Photoplay theater, operated by McIntyre & McGhee. Work has been resumed in the Mammoth district, however, and the Photoplay is once more the center of attraction in Robinson.

The new Latter Day Saints amusement hall at Silver City, Utah, was opened last Thursday and among the attractions of the opening night was a motion picture show. The new amusement hall has been completely equipped for exhibiting pictures.

E. J. Rhoads, manager of two motion picture theaters in Eureka, owned by the Western Amusement company, was in Salt Lake last week booking attraction for his two houses.

HUMANITY MADE THE AWARD.

An incident which was itself worth preserving in a film written around it marked the ending of the Lyric theater's popularity contest in Lima, O. Ralph Williams, a crippled newsboy, had been one of the hardest workers for the several prizes offered, including an automobile and a diamond ring, desiring to sell the prize, if he won it, in order to help pay for an operation to restore his injured leg. He failed, however, to land a prize, being fifth on the list; and when this became known, and his keen disappointment was appreciated, the management came to the front with a benefit performance, at which all of the proceeds were turned over to the little chap, who will get his operation after all.

Will Start Production

Highland Film Company Has Delaware Charter—Takes Over Plant of Smaller Concern in Covington, Ky.—Will Begin Making Pictures June 1—May Secure Studio on Pacific Coast for Winter Work or Build in Savannah, Ga.

By Kenneth C. Crain, Cincinnati Correspondent of Moving Picture World.

PLANS for the opening of the first exclusively dramatic producing film company near Cincinnati are going ahead rapidly, James T. Ford, president and active manager of the Highland Film Corporation, being in charge. The company was recently formally incorporated with a Delaware charter, with a capital stock of $3,500,000, other officers being H. F. McGee, vice-president; Joseph Kapfer, vice-president and technical art director; B. H. Rechtin, secretary; George I. Breidel, assistant secretary, and H. M. Ricketts, treasurer. Mr. Ford is authority for the statement that the company will release its productions through its own exchanges exclusively, the plan being to establish these offices in all of the principal cities of the United States and Canada. An interesting development is that indicated by negotiations which are from now on to take over a Pacific coast producing company to handle the output during the winter season; if this fails winter quarters will be secured at Savannah, Ga. The R. & G. Film Co., of Covington, Ky., a small concern, with a capacity of 2,500 feet a day, has been taken over, Mr. Ford announces, and its output will at once be increased to 10,000 feet a day, pending the completion of the full equipment of the company. The site at Ft. Thomas, comprising 97 acres of land in the vicinity of the fort, is being prepared for use, and it is announced that the production of pictures will be started, at least on an outdoor stage, by June 1.

"UNCLE SAM AT WORK."

Pictures of the Big Business We All Own Go Well in Cincinnati.

The exhibition of the so-called "$100,000 wonder picture," known as "Uncle Sam at Work," based in a general way on the Haskin book, "The American Government," at the Lyric theater, beginning the first of last week, was notable in several ways, at least one of which does not seem to have received the attention to which it is entitled. This is the fact that the charges were the highest which have yet been made in Cincinnati at an exclusively moving-picture exhibition, ranging from 25 to 50 cents at night. And, notwithstanding this relatively high figure, for Cincinnati, the exhibition was largely attended, and bids fair to draw big houses during the entire two weeks' engagement. Its educational value, which has been highly indorsed here and elsewhere, seems to be fully appreciated, and as children are admitted for fifteen cents, they are taking full advantage of it. A feature attending the first few days of the engagement, which occasioned some surprise, was the abrupt halt of the smooth progress of the performance at the behest of Chief of Police Copelan, acting, as it developed, not as a local censor, but on behalf of the State Board. By some oversight the approval of the Ohio board had not been obtained, and the exhibition was accordingly stopped, resulting in the disappointment of several large audiences. The film was promptly rushed to Columbus, however, by Paul Hillman, handling the Lyric moving-picture season, and William Burlock, representing Henry W. Savage, the producer, and the approval of the board promptly obtained. In fact, the board took occasion to indorse in full the high educational and patriotic value of the pictures, sending them back with its blessing, as it were, and the engagement proceeded without further interruption. Two performances a day of the nine reels are given, with a special performance for children on Saturday morning. A peculiar feature of the interruption to secure the necessary censorship approval is the fact that the pictures were shown for a month in Cleveland without exception being taken to the absence of the approval.

"ALIAS JIMMY VALENTINE" SHOWN IN OHIO PRISON.

The World Feature Film Co.'s film production of "Alias Jimmy Valentine," one of the first and best of the "crook plays" which have been popular during the last few years, with Robert Warwick in the title role, received a unique indorsement recently. It was exhibited, by special arrangement, at the Ohio Penitentiary, at Columbus, and was seen by fourteen hundred men imprisoned in that institution. The film contains a number of prison scenes, taken in Sing Sing, and the local color was easily recognized by this unusual audience. According to the "Ohio Penitentiary News," a journal published by and for the convicts, "Fourteen hundred men, imprisoned for every known crime, wildly cheered the picture." They especially applauded the declaration of "Jimmy" that "every crook would go straight if he had the chance." It is a pleasing melodrama.

EXHIBITORS AND PROGRAMS.

With a view to making the list of Cincinnati theaters devoted to moving pictures very nearly 100 per cent. full, Manager Otto Ernst Schmidt, of the German theater, an institution which has met with considerable success in Cincinnati, is considering arrangements to show a war picture, "Through the Enemy's Lines," at the Empress, which has been closed for several weeks. The Empress is the local Loew vaudeville house, and has a good seating capacity. The war film may be shown at Music Hall instead of at this house, however.

Manager Speidel, of the Royal theater, conducted an experiment recently with a view to determining for his own satisfaction whether his patrons preferred feature pictures, at ten cents, to a five-cent show, and ran the latter kind, after a considerable period of feature exhibitions, for three weeks. At the end of the three weeks he decided that the question was sufficiently well settled, as far as he was concerned, and he accordingly went back to features, via the Shubert-Brady program, at the former charge of ten cents; and indications are that everybody is very well pleased indeed.

The Big Time Feature Exhibitors' Association, observing the way people flocked to see the Williamson submarine pictures when they were shown recently at the Grand, promptly nailed the films for the use of its members; and the latest report is that the pictures, which were extensively advertised on their first appearance in the city, have done so well at the local houses where they have since been shown that they will be kept in the city indefinitely. Edward Lester is booking them for exhibition in this section.

The management of the Grand theater, at Sidney, O., showed its fine sporting and civic spirit recently when it arranged with the "Elco 30" baseball team, which represents the town acceptably on the diamond, for a series of special performances in order to pay for the boys' uniforms and other initial expenses. The exhibitions were well attended, at a charge of ten cents, and a neat sum was realized for the benefit of the athletes.

Consistency Creates Confidence

The enormous bookings commanded by the TWO REEL BIOGRAPH were not accomplished by one or two productions, or even five or six; but the consistent superior productions, week after week, for thirty-five weeks have created such confidence among the exhibitors that they can absolutely depend on this Tuesday Release as a program headliner. Such confidence is an attribute of all Biograph pictures. Exhibitors have learned that the Biograph producers are everlastingly bending every effort to improve the quality of motion pictures, and the TWO REEL BIOGRAPH is representative of their success.

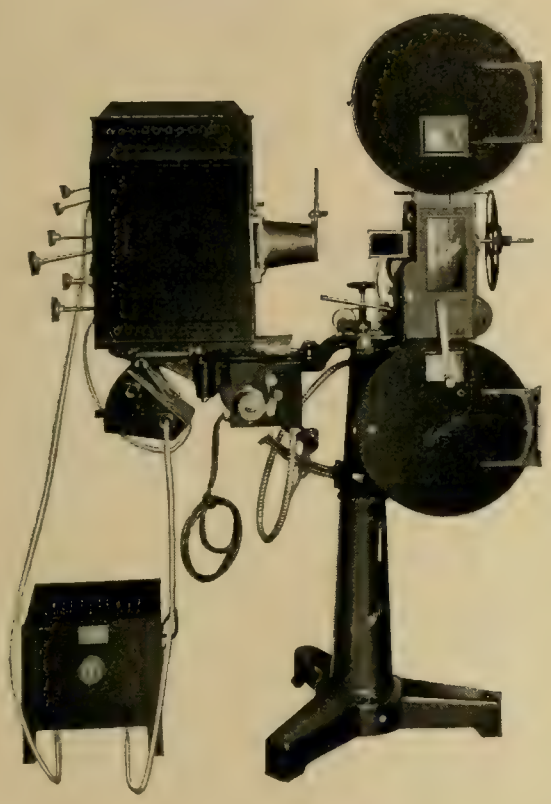
Remarkable Record for Simplex

The following is quoted from an article in the Moving Picture World of April 17th, 1915:



"STRAND CELEBRATES FIRST ANNIVERSARY.

New York's Big Picture Theatre Finishes First Year with a Special Program.

REMARKABLE RECORD

On Sunday, April 11th, the Strand Theatre, Forty-seventh Street and Broadway, New York, celebrated its first anniversary.

Here are a few of the statistics: During the past year 182,500,000 feet of film have been run through the PICTURE MACHINE. IN ALL THAT TIME THE MACHINE HAS STOPPED BUT ONCE DURING A PERFORMANCE FOR A FRACTION OF A MINUTE. Two thousand, one hundred and ninety performances were presented at the Strand during the past year; 4,380,000 people have paid admissions to the Strand since the opening night."

To Test Fight Film Law

There Is a Report in Washington That a Test Case Will Be Brought Before Supreme Court to Determine the Constitutionality of the Ban on Prize Fight Films Not Offered for Sale, but Meant for Exhibition Solely.

By Clarence L. Linz, Washington Correspondent of Moving Picture World.

A PRESS report to this city tells of the probability of the bringing before the Supreme Court of the United States a case to test the constitutionality of the law forbidding the transportation in interstate commerce of the Johnson-Willard fight pictures, and it is said here that the government has expressed a willingness to expedite such a case in every way. It is not thought that the owners of the films will make an effort to secure the right to ship them in interstate commerce for the purpose of sale, but only to ship them for exhibition purposes. It will no doubt be held that the law transgresses upon the police powers of the individual states, in that no attempt will be made to make sales.

THE ROMANCE OF THE MOTION PICTURE

C. Francis Jenkins Lectures to Press Club on Development of the Picture.

C. Francis Jenkins delivered a very interesting lecture last week before the University Club on "The Romance of the Motion Picture," in which the development of the industry was traced from the time the first pictures were shown in this city in the early nineties, at Seventh and E streets, Northwest. He told of the difficulties which atended his efforts in 1894 when he started promoting his first machine here. He declared that Washington is the birthplace of more revolutionary inventions than any other ten square miles of teritory on the face of the earth. He spoke of the educational value of truthful, instructive pictures. New modifications are at present taking place, he said—the ability of the exhibitors to choose those films which seem best adapted to their individual localities, and the increase in the price of admission to these theaters.

The value of the business done last year, he said, was $800,000,000, and he estimated that $15,000,000 is invested in motion picture companies in Southern California alone.

WASHINGTON BRIEFS.

Business in Cumberland, Md., is not what it should be, according to Samuel Wertheimer, of Wertheimer Bros., and it will require the constant employment of the people of that section for some time before conditions again become normal. Mr. Wertheimer states that all of the business houses are also complaining, and that many people are out of work. He visited Washington last week with a view to booking features to liven things up a bit.

The management of the Lyric, in Blacksburg, Va., have been up against a strange proposition brought about by their success with "The Exploits of Elaine." It seems that this serial has been booked for Wednesday exhibitions, which evening is also devoted to midweek services in all of the churches of that place, and that the serial has had such a great drawing power, that the church attendance has so dwindled as to cause the ministers to request Manager W. W. Argabrite to change to some other night. Naturally, he has complied with their request. The Lyric is enjoying an excellent business and this fact is well borne out by the plaint of the church authorities.

M. L. Hofheimer was a visitor last week at the Pathe Exchange where he booked features, comics and the "Who Pays" series for the Little and the New theaters in Richmond, Va., and the National theater, in Lynchburg, Va.

Harry Crandall, of Crandall's theater, in this city, was so well pleased with his showing of "The Nigger" for a four days' period last week that he immediately booked it for a return engagement of two days for the present week. During the four days mentioned he found it practically impossible to accommodate the crowds which endeavered to gain entrance to the show.

Mrs. A. E. Thorp, of the Rex, in Richmond, Va., paid a visit to the local exchanges.

Walter Vincent, of the Wilmer and Vincent theaters, of New York stopped over in this city on his return trip from Richmond, Va.

Mr. Myrtle, of the Art theater, in Staunton, Va., is planning to take an outfit to Grottoes, Va., in the Shenandoah Valley, for the purpose of giving nightly exhibitions to the 250 or more boy students of the Staunton Military Academy who will go to that place for a ten days' encampment. He has aranged for a five-reel program. The camp grounds are wired for electricity so that this year he will not be forced to carry a portable electrical outfit with him.

NEWS LETTER FROM MAINE.

By John P. Flannagan, Maine Correspondent of M. P. W.

THE many friends of Cornelius B. Kelleher, of Waterville, proprietor of the City Opera House, were grieved to hear of the death of his mother, Mrs. Margaret Kelleher, this week, at an advanced age. The City Opera House was closed for several days following her death, reopening on last Thursday afternoon.

The Opera House, at Stonington, has recently contracted for one big feature weekly from the World Film Corporation. It is the intention of Mr. Noyes, the manager, to establish a policy of one big night each week with an admission of 25 cents. The first attraction is "America" the New York Hippodrome production.

The apartments of Guy M. Farmer, proprietor of the Palace, in Bangor, were gutted by fire last week, with a loss of $1,800. Mr. Farmer had his property fully insured, but had recently moved from Brewer, and had forgotten to notify the insurance company. It is possible that he may not recover any insurance.

The Strand, Ellsworth, reports capacity houses on "Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch," a World Film attraction in five parts.

The work of renovating Portland's summer theaters, those at Riverton and Cape Cottage, has begun. For some days workmen have been engaged at Riverton in demolishing the old seats. Now the work of regrading the amphitheatre and preparing the new seats has been started, and will be rushed so that everything will be in readiness for the opening in June.

At the Cape theater the roof will be re-shingled, while the same will be done on the roof of the theater at Riverton, so that both of these resorts will be in better condition than they have been for years.

The tendency on the part of exhibitors, according to one Maine exchange man, seems to be to run attractions big enough and good enough so that they may charge from 15 to 25 cents admission.

The Casco theater, at Portland, has opened under entirely new management and will hereafter endeavor to give the play loving public only the best photoplays to be obtained, and only those of real merit will be staged.

Keith's theater, at Portland, has been re-decorated and considerably improved during the past week. The walls and ceilings have been retinted and the theater has been re-carpeted throughout. The color scheme of the ladies' parlor has been improved by laying a rich carpet of bright red, which replaces a green one, while the floors of the orchestra and balcony are spread with a pretty pattern of dark blue and red carpeting, giving to the spacious theater a spick and span appearance worthy of a note of commendation.

"The exhibitor who first realizes that the day has come to cast aside the loose and lurid photoplay, and gives his house the backing of great theatrical names and the dollar-pulling power of a Broadway box office, will hold his public in the palm of his hand." The foregoing is one of the statements made by E. P. Tinker of Ellsworth, Me., about the World Film program.

H. O. Hussey of Bucksport will open a moving picture theater at Verona Park this summer for the summer season as soon as warm weather is here.

Paul P. Peakes of the Chic theater at Milo was a visitor to Bangor during the week, reporting business to be good.

Pero Morris, of Greenville and Monson, in both of which places he has houses, was a caller on the trade in Bangor during the week, reporting excellent business.

E. R. Jordan has started using Universal service one night a week at his theater in Kenduskeag.

Maine moving picture men are glad to hear that Wallace Gould of Brunswick, proprietor of the Pastime, which was destroyed by fire a few weeks ago, will rebuild. The new theater will seat 700 people and will have the latest improvements. Mr. Gould's enterprise in commencing the erection of the theater is all the more commendable in view of the fact that he had no insurance on his former house.

Jos. Emery, proprietor of the Star theater at Bar Harbor, has booked "The Black Box" from Manager Chas. M. Stern of the Bangor Universal Exchange. Mr. Emery was in town during the week on his way to Boston.

A. Ross, of the Famous Players Company, was a visitor to Bangor during the week.

The highest admission price ever paid in a Bangor moving picture house will be that at "Damon & Pythias," which is to appear at the Park theater at an admission price of 25 cents on May 4-5-6.

William Green, of the Mutual Film Company, Portland, was a visitor to Bangor during the week on his return from a four weeks' business trip through Aroostook and Washington counties. Mr. Green brings the interesting news from Aroostook county that the first moving picture machine to be installed in any high school in the state of Maine will be that in the Caribou high school by Supt. Boston of the Caribou schools. The Mutual Film Company has the distinction of being the firm to supply the films for the school.

Harry Conant, proprietor of the Limestone theater, has taken on Mutual Film service three nights a week.

Proprietor Thomas Willett of the Dreamland theater, at Van Buren, has taken the Mutual service two nights a week.

The Lyric at Washburn, Earl Gibson proprietor, has taken on Mutual service two nights a week.

Fred Hamilton, proprietor of the Gem at Fort Kent, has started Mutual service two nights a week.

The Star theater at Eastport is being extensively renovated and enlarged so that the seating capacity will be increased from 650 to over 1,000. Proprietor Wilbur Shea uses Mutual service.

BROOKLINE BARS PICTURES.

Antis of Neighborhood Out and Eager to Vote with Their Ministers.

After a hearing as to whether it would be advisable to grant licenses for moving picture theaters in Brookline, Mass., the richest New England town, the Board of Selectmen decided against such action.

At the hearing dozens of prominent citizens argued for and as many against, the public having been invited by the selectmen for the purpose of ascertaining the sentiment of the citizens. At the close of the meeting, a vote was taken and with less than half of those present excercising the privilege, the result stood 48 for licenses and 60 against. Philip S. Parker, chairman of the board, presided.

The meeting opened in the selectmen's room, but popular interest had been underestimated, for citizens kept pouring in until no more could be admitted, so the meeting adjourned to the town hall.

Among those who were in favor of granting licenses were former Representative John A. Curtin, representing a group of Brookline taxpayers who desire a moving picture theater at Coolidge corner; Alfred J. Hayman, a real estate dealer, who desires to build a house at the same place; Albert M. Beers, who petitioned for permission to erect a theater in Washington square; Stanley Bishop, an attorney; former Senator Charles H. Pearson, Jesse Wiley and Arthur A. Wordell.

Those who spoke against licenses were Albert L. Lincoln, the Rev. Michael T. McManus, pastor of St. Mary's Church of the Assumption; the Rev. John T. Sheehan; Dr. J. Herbert Moore; the Rev. William W. Iliffe, pastor of the Brookline Presbyterian Church; Irving Elting; Selectman Charles H. Stearns; Homer L. Albers, dean of Boston University.

Mr. Hayman, one of the petitioners, stated that he was interested in a moving picture project and said that if it was operated under strict censorship, the people of Brokoline could not reasonably object.

Mr. Curtin stated that he represented an influential group of taxpayers who were interested in the proposition and intimated that there was room for others to join the organization. He said that the possibilities of moving pictures were without limitation and that they had come to stay. He said, "With a proper censorship and regulation, there can be no valid objection. We intend to invest $200,000 if necessary in this property and it will mean so much more to the taxes of the town. Moreover, with a Chinese laundry, poolrooms and other commercial propositions at Coolidge Corner, I can see no objection to a moving picture theater. People are entitled to moving pictures under proper regulations. They are part and parcel of American life.

Stanley Bishop said that hundreds went out of Brookline each week to see pictures in other places and that they did not appear to be degenerate. Former Senator Pearson said that he favored moving picture houses, providing they were strictly censored, the buildings of first class and that the town limit their number.

Mr. Wiley, speaking for himself and Dr. Vernon of the Harvard Congregational Church, suggested proper regulation. Arthur Wordell argued that since the town provided playgrounds for the children, why not moving pictures for the adults.

Albert Lincoln, representing the Brookline Friendly Society, a charitable organization which operates moving pictures for educational purposes only, said that there was no necessity for more moving pictures, and that they were given merely for commercial purposes. He feared that if they were once admitted, the houses would never be closed, and that they would be a detriment to his organization.

Race Prejudice Bill

Massachusetts Negroes Want State to Pass Bill Prohibiting Any Show Tending to Excite Race Prejudice—Neither State Nor Law Courts Had Power to Act Against the Griffith Film and Colored Folk Were Disappointed.

By Edwin H. McCloskey, New England Correspondent of Moving Picture World.

DESPITE the strong protestations of the colored gentry of the city of Boston, "The Birth of a Nation" is still playing to capacity houses at the Tremont theater.

A futile appeal was made to Governor David I. Walsh by the colored people, but he was powerless to act, however, he advised the protestants to apply for a warrant for the arrest of the producers of the film and the manager of the theater. These were refused by Judge Thomas H. Dowd after he had witnessed the production. In their dying effort to prevent this film from continuing its successful engagement, the colored people and their supporters are endeavoring to secure the pasage of a bill in the Legislature, which would prohibit the performance of "any show or entertainment which tends to excite racial prejudice or tends to a breach of the public peace."

In making their appeal to the governor, the colored protestants stormed the State House 1,000 strong. The governor received them after a conference with the attorney general, police commissioner and police superintendent. After listening to their pleading, he informed them that he was powerless to act and he suggested the request for a warrant on the ground that the entertainment was immoral and obscene. Among those who spoke were Anna Philips Wendell Williams, white, a niece of Wendell Philips, Joshua Crawford, Alice W. McKane, Mrs. A. Sparrow, Dr. R. L. Roberts, Mrs. Agnes Adams, Mrs. E. Putnam and William D. Brigham. As the governor was leaving the executive chamber, the colored folks called their blessings to him. Several of them shook his hand and others knelt on their knees and exalted the executive.

The following day, the same army of colored folks stormed the municipal court at Boston and were granted a hearing by Judge Dowd. Warrants were asked for Joseph J. McCarthy, general manager for the Griffith Film Company and for John Schoeffel, manager of the Tremont theater. The witnesses heard were Dr. Horace Bumstead, former president of Atlanta University; the Rev. Samuel A. Brown, pastor of St. Mark's Congregational Church, Roxbury, and State Police Officer Harry Atkinson, the official censor of photoplays that are to be exhibited in this state on Sundays.

The colored element was represented by J. Mott Hallowell, while Attorney John F. Cusick represented the theatrical company. At the conclusion of the hearing, Judge Dowd announced that he would witness the film in the evening and announce his decision in the morning.

At the morning's session, the judge gave the film company twenty-four hours to cut out the cliff scene, in which Gus, the renegade negro chases a young girl over the cliff and she jumps to escape his clutches. He steadfastly refused to grant the warrant for the men named, claiming that with the elimination the show could not be classed as immoral or obscene.

With the elimination of this scene, the colored folks were not satisfied, declaring that the whole production ought to be stopped as it is historically incorrect. The bill which is now pending before the legislature was then presented. At the hearing on this bill several negroes and whites were present. Lieut. Governor Grafton D. Cushing and former Congressman Samuel W. McCall, were named among the protestants.

William H. Lewis, one of the leading colored citizens of the country, and assistant U. S. Attorney general under Roosevelt, was loudly applauded for his address in favor of the passage of the bill. He stated that an attempt is being made to degrade and belittle the negro in the eyes of his friends. The play has been brought to Boston to have Massachusetts put its stamp of approval on it. He continued, "We are not satisfied by what has been cut out by order of the court in the deletion of the "Gus" scene. The place to cut off a snake's tail is at his neck. You have scenes disgusting and degrading in the play which never happened. Not only that but New England is held up to ridicule, by the depiction of Thaddeus Stevens and Charles Sumner. We object to this play for the propaganda which it presents and which tends to raise prejudice against the negro. The bill which may be drawn makes no difference so long as we get relief. Massachusetts has a history to sustain and it lies with the Legislature as to whether it will sustain that history, or whether it will allow those illustrious men who have represented Massachusetts to be held up to ridicule. We do not mind the minstrel or the fun loving negro, but we shall protest forever against such a calumny as this upon the colored race."

Miss Adeline Moffat said that of all the plays she has seen, she had never seen anything so insidiously immoral. She cited two instances of reaction which she had heard. As a Southerner, she said that every family had some pride, but that there was not one which was willing to acknowledge an ancestor who was a member of the Ku Klux Klan, which has been pictured in an absolutely untruthful light.

Frank Hammond, secretary of the executive committee of the Bar Association, said that the present law left the licensing to the discretion of the authorities, and he thought that it might be better to make the laws so specific that there would be no room for such discretion.

Rev. Herbert S. Johnson suggested that all those interested in the question might get together and draw up a satisfactory bill. As to race prejudice, he said that not all of the indignation has come from the negro and that as much harm has been done to the morals of the white man as injustice to the negro. If this was a fight between Catholics and Protestants, that play would not be on the stage a week, he declared.

NEW ENGLAND BRIEFS.

George A. Hickey, formerly a roadman for the New England office of the United Film Service, is now connected with the Mutual office, where he is handling the famous Mutual masterpictures.

J. A. Eslow, manager of the New England Universal Exchange, has been chosen as chairman of the board of judges, in the suffrage photoplay scenario contest, recently conducted by the Boston Evening Record.

Manager George W. Allen, Jr., of Allen's theater, New Bedford, received many complimentary letters from fire and police officials in his city last week, when during a fire prevention campaign conducted by the officials in conjunction with the newspaper, he exhibited the Vitagraph spectacle, "The Locked Door." Incidentally the film played to capacity houses.

HERMAN RIDDER LECTURES WAR PICTURES.

By Moving Picture World's Cincinnati Correspondent.

One of the most distinguished, or well advertised, citizens who has yet appeared in Cincinnati in personal connection with moving pictures was at Music Hall last Tuesday, being B. Herman Ridder, of the New York "Staats-Zeitung," presenting a lecture on the war from the German side, and incidentally displaying eight reels of excellent war pictures. These pictures, which aroused the large audiences which attended the lecture to a high pitch of enthusiasm, evidenced by cheering, were taken under the direct auspices of the Grman general staff, according to Mr. Ridder. They bear the official stamp of the War Ministry, differing in this respect from many pictures which have been exhibited as coming from the German side, and, inasmuch as they were taken with the specific purpose in view of being exhibited in America, it is understood, they showed much variety and interest.

GENERAL FILM'S BOSTON HEADQUARTERS DE LUXE.

By Moving Picture World's Boston Correspondent.

Work will soon be started on the new Boston headquarters of the General Film Company. The building, which will be constructed by Max Schoolman, is to be erected at the corner of Ferdinand and Isabella Streets, South End. A church now occupies this site, but is to be razed. It will be a two story affair. The executive offices will be on the first floor. A feature of the building will be a small theater, with a seating capacity of 300 persons and a pitched floor. A check room for the clothes of exhibitors, who are watching runoffs will be provided. It is estimated that the building will cost $95,000.

Florida Wants Studios

A Promoter with Land to Dispose of Near Jacksonville Makes Attractive Sounding Offer to Picture Manufacturers—Description of the Tract and Account of Its Facilities and Advantages—Many Makers Already in Florida.

By Leon Louiso, Jacksonville Correspondent of Moving Picture World.

FLORIDA is being described in glowing terms by many directors who have taken pictures here this winter. One director came down for eight scenes, to complete the correct atmosphere for a feature he was making. A local man is boosting the state by his efforts to secure a number of companies to come to Florida and to build studios here. He is the owner of a large tract of land about six miles from Jacksonville. The tract that is being developed consists of about six hundred acres. At present there is one studio on the grounds, but it is his intention to develop a colony of studios on the tract. The grounds include various kinds of scenery peculiar to the country, including semi-tropical scenes of various kinds, water scenes on a placid stream, that is a subsidiary of the St. John's River, jungle scenery, prairie and many other kinds of locations. An artificial canal has been dug out and the building of a big hotel is contemplated. A board walk will be constructed and a bathing beach will be installed. There are a number of residences built on the site at present and lots are being sold right along. For beach and ocean scenes it is only a matter of a few miles to the Jetties at Mayport, Fla. For this trip the promoter has a fifty foot cruiser, which is completely furnished. Two automobiles are at his service. The land has some low hills, which could be utilized to advantage. The promoter has hourly bus service to and from the place. It is his intention to make the moving picture companies a proposition whereby they will be given a 10 year lease, free, if they will locate on the tract. They will have the use of the cruiser and the two automobiles and free 'bus service to and from the city. The fact that Florida has about 300 days in the year in which pictures can be taken outside makes the proposition look good and it is thought that it will be only a question of a few years before Florida will have a large number of studios. The state is so easily accessible to New York, where all of the companies, almost without exception, have head offices.

LUBIN VISITS JACKSONVILLE.

Siegmund Lubin and Mrs. Lubin were in Florida recently. This was Mr. Lubin's first visit to Jacksonville since Director Arthur D. Hotaling first began coming to this city to take pictures during the winter months. In an interview for local newspapers he is quoted as saying that Jacksonville is ideal for moving pictures, surpassing in some respects the California centers and equalling them in all. Aside from the climatic conditions of Jacksonville and vicinity being ideal for the production and manufacture of moving pictures, Mr. Lubin stated that he liked the city itself. He declared that he intends to do all he can to make this city one of the greatest moving picture producing and manufacturing centers in the country. He admitted that he was seriously considering the advisability of purchasing from forty to sixty acres of land in the immediate vicinity of here and investing half a million dollars or more in the development of one of the greatest motion picture studios and plants in the country.

Mr. Lubin further stated that the climate, and scenery and the wonderful hard sandy beaches, which he says, have no rival in the world, are great advantages. And that he sees no reason for moving his people from one place to another to make the motion pictures of the 100 or more great plays he has purchased and will produce when he can concentrate the entire assemblage of workers and professional talent here in Jacksonville, where they can work out of dors winter and summer. He also thinks that live stock can be kept here cheaper than in the North.

The evening before he left for Philadelphia, with Mrs. Lubin, some of the local company were entertained at dinner at the Hotel Mason. Those present were Director Arthur D. Hotaling, Miss Mae Hotely, Mr. Billie Reeves and wife and Miss Patsy De Forest.

STUDIO NOTES.

Director Hotaling will leave for Atlantic City, with his company, about the middle of May. The company will stay there all summer and will return about the middle of October. The company has been working in the Billie Reeves comedies, the first of which is to be released May 15.

Myrtle Tannehill, who came down for a picture at the Kalem studio, under the direction of Mr. Kenean Buel, has finished and she has returned to New York City.

Ruth Snow has returned from Boston, Mass., where she has been on a few weeks' vacation.

Jere Austin has purchased a new 1915 model Stearns automobile. Mr. Austin is an auto "bug" and he is quite a repair man, being able to do nearly all his own repairing on the car and engine, when necessary.

L. E. Taylor, who was recently with the Kalem company in the capacity of cameraman for Director Buel, has returned from New York City. His wife is a member of the Kalem stock here.

Geo. K. Hollister, who took a vacation for a few weeks, has returned and has comenced work again with Director Robert G. Vignola's company, with Alice Hollister and Harry Milarde.

Director Guy Coombs has finished up "Fate's Checkerboard" and has started work on a college picture, which will be a two reeel subject.

OTHER NOTES.

The Pathe Exchange, Inc., has established a branch office here, located at 18 Ocean St. The branch is under the management of James E. Wilbanks, who was for a long time connected with the World Film Company. He is known over the territory as "Sunny Jim." The office will handle the business of the state of Florida. Mr. Wilbanks reports good business all over the state.

Paramount pictures are bringing the people to the Prince theater. The features are usually of a good quality and the theater is quite a favorite.

The Republic did big business with Johnson-Willard pictures, and "The House of Bondage." This theater will be one of the coolest in the city during the summer, as well as one of the cosiest big theaters.

Mrs. Geo. Schmidt, whose husband is acting manager of the Prince theater, has gone with her sister, Miss Carrie Ann Bartholomew, to their home for a visit, in Indiana.

A recent Chas. Chaplin picture at the Grand kept the crowds standing out again. The theatre runs two Chaplin pictures a week, and they seem to be drawing well.

The Imperial has Don Ferrandou, who was at one time with the Lubin Company here, but who is now finishing up a vaudeville engagement. Ferrandou has a good voice and proves a good number for the Imperial.

HER PROPER PLACE (Special—Three Parts—May 10).—Agnes Reynolds, bookkeeper in her father's office in a suburban town, is considered the drudge of the household, while her sisters, May and Clarabelle, enjoy a comfortable position in the social set. Harry Cornell, the bank president's son, with whom, it had been generally understood in the town, Agnes was in love, has become enamored of May, and in consequence, Agnes is wholly disregarded by him and her sisters. To add to Agnes' sorrow, Tom, her brother, has returned from college, for the holidays, and informs his mother he is in debt and needs money badly. One thing leads to another, the marriage of May and Harry being the proverbial last straw. Agnes startles her family by stating that she is going to the Capital to work and get something out of life. Agnes has, for some months, admired Senator William Northrup. At the Capital, Agnes gets work as a clerk in the office of a real estate operator, whose office is immediately opposite that of Senator Northrup. She progresses well in her work, and studies stenography in the evenings. Attempts to get financial assistance from home prove futile, and she has to be extremely parsimonious to get along.

One evening she remains at the office after hours to complete work on a title. As she is leaving she hears loud voices in Senator Northrup's office and listens. She deduces that someone is trying to bribe the Senator to remain away from the session when the anti-betting bill is to be presented. The senator repudiates the bribe, and in emphatic terms tells the agent of the gamblers he will champion the bill on the floor of the Senate. There is a pistol shot and the would-be murderer rushes out past Agnes. She rushes in, and, staunching the flow of blood temporarily, calls a doctor. The Senator is impressed by the beauty of Agnes, and is so grateful that he indiscreetly offers her money. Agnes leaves, and the Senator realizes his mistake. Subsequently the bill is passed, the Senator telling of the attempted murder and bribe. Efforts to find Agnes are futile, and Senator Northrup is discouraged. She has returned home, and told her family she is engaged to Senator Northrug, now a candidate for Governor. Agnes is feted and lionized. The newspapers get it and Senator Northrup denies the story flatly. Agnes is cornered. A reception is given, and out of curiosity, Senator Northrup goes to the town to see who the woman is who is playing the game. He meets Agnes and realizes. She asks forgiveness and agrees to tell the newspapers the real conditions, as a scandal will ruin his political career. Instead, he asks her whether she can try and care for him a bit, and the answer is affirmative.

NEARLY A SCANDAL (May 12).—Snitz was jealous of his wife. Otto loved Steena, the maid at the Snitz homestead, and a letter to his sweetheart caused all the trouble. Besieged by his creditors, Otto writes to Steena invoking pecuniary assistance. Steena, the unfortunate thing, can neither read nor write. Consequently, after Andy has read Otto's note to her, asking that she meet him in the park near the little fountain, Steena asks Mrs. Snitz to answer it. When she has finished it, Mrs. Snitz writes another note to her husband, stating that she has gone to the park for a walk. She dresses and goes out. Steena also prepares to go to the park, and in due time leaves the house. Snitz returns, and after he has read his wife's note, sees an impression on the blotter that opens his eyes. Seizing a revolver, he hustles to the park.

Then the fun begins. Otto soon arrives with an armful of flowers he has generously bought for Steena, to be exchanged for a few dollar bills. Steena enters the park, and suddenly spies her sweetheart. Snitz starts to shoot up the park, the first dum-dum imbedding itself in Captain O'Shea, the park policeman. With Snitz in pursuit, Otto and Steena, with other park visitors, rush up and down the paths and lanes. Steena finally holds up the excited Snitz and explains that it was her Otto to whom the letter was written, Mrs. Snitz writing it as a favor to her. Mrs. Snitz comes into the scene just in time to bowl over Captain O'Shea, who is about to arrest Snitz for discharging fire arms against persons in a public park. Steena rushes to Otto's arms as Mrs. Snitz and her jealous husband decide it was all a mistake. Captain O'Shea is kicked away by Snitz.

AN INNOCENT THIEF (May 11).—Mrs. Mercer has just received a letter from Beatrice Mills, stating that she will be in the city to visit her early in the month and possibly to spend the entire winter with her. Dick Mercer is not very enthusiastic over the letter, but when Beatrice arrives he falls in love with her at once and they become engaged. Away back in the country, longing for the sights and diversions of the city is Peggy. Seeing a newspaper advertisement for girls in a shirtwaist factory, she prevails upon her mother to allow her to go to New York, and sells her poultry to get the railroad fare. In the city Peggy is unable to get work and she has various experiences with young toughs on the street and in the park. She has just taken a seat in the park when a rowdy approaches her and makes an advance as if to take the handbag she is carrying. Peggy runs away and the tough gives chase. She runs up the steps of a fine residence and her screams attract the occupants of the house. Dick Mercer and his mother come out and the latter takes Peggy into the house. Dick is amazed at her beauty and persuades his mother to keep the unfortunate girl overnight, after Peggy has told her story.

In the morning Dick uses his influence once more in Peggy's behalf and she is given a place as maid in the Mercer home. Beatrice asks who she is and when she is told, warns the Mercers to look out for her or something valuable will be missing. Dick does not lose confidence in Peggy, however, and because of her kindness to him, he becomes much attached to her and secretly loves her. Peggy is also reluctant to evidence her love. She enters the living-room, where Dick has left his coat and handles it and caresses it, as if it were animate. When she hears Dick coming she hastily withdraws. Beatrice enters with him and notices a woman's hair on his coat. There is an argument and Peggy enters and explains that it was all her fault. Beatrice takes off her engagement ring and Dick throws it to the floor in a fit of rage. Thinking she has caused trouble, Peggy prepares to leave and creeps into his room to get one last look at his picture. The impulse is too strong, and she takes the picture. As she is leaving, Dick enters and accuses her of the theft of his heart, making her his prisoner for life.

THE STRUGGLE UPWARD (Special—Two Parts—May 14).—So that she might interest him in settlement work, Marjorie Atwood introduces her cousin, Philip Atwood, to Helen Turner, a prominent charity worker. Helen and Philip are at once attracted to each other, and the former promises to visit the settlement with Philip the next day. In the home of Mrs. Morton, a gloomy atmosphere pervades the squalid flat. Jack, a shiftless, idle fellow, thinks more of his friends than his hard-working mother, and leaves with Jim Riley to hang out and waste more time with the gang on the corner. Little Artie, lame as the result of an injury to his foot, is lying on the couch, helpless. On one of her missions, Helen visits the Morton home. Jack is impressed by her and resolves to better himself. The following day he has occasion to prove to Helen that he has some manhood in him, by rescuing her from a gang which started to annoy her, after she remonstrated with them for fighting with a storekeeper. Philip in reality is an arch crook and gambler in his own world. While in his gambling room, making "books" on the races, the police enter and it is with difficulty that Philip escapes. Within an hour he is in the midst of the children at the settlement.

Helen and Philip are married. Jealousy has changed Helen in Philip's eyes. He is cruel and inconsiderate, and she begins to see him as he really is. On one occasion, when Jack is endeavoring to make a convert, and is standing at the settlement door with him, Helen and Philip enter. The young tough recognizes Philip as the man who beat him out of several bets and mentions that the gang is about to "get" him. Jack informs Helen of this, and the result of it is that Philip decides to move away where they are not known. Jack has successfully resisted all temptation to return to the gang and is studying for the ministry. Subsequently, he is ordained and is assigned to a church far from his native town.

After a few years Helen decides to seek advice from someone as Philip's abuse of her is terrible. She goes to see the new curate and finds it to be Jack. As the two are leaving the chapel, Philip, who has followed her, swears revenge. Thrusting his pistol through the window at Jack's rectory he shoots, but a little book Helen had given Jack saves his life. Philip then takes his own life despairingly.

HIS PEASANT PRINCESS (May 15).—The King of Rodenkurst is visiting the King of Steinfeldt, and a game of chess is in progress. The regal personages agree to disagree over a certain move, and in an instant they have sacrificed all their dignity and engaged in physical encounter. They are separated, but friendship has been severed. Fifteen years later Prince Karl of Rodenkurst leaves for college. About this time, Baron Rufhaus of Steinfeldt invites Baron Heiswasser of Rodenkurst to his castle to devise some way of restoring the erstwhile friendly relations. They decide that a marriage of Prince Karl with Princess Victoria of Steinfeldt is the logical step, and set about to effect the important move. Victoria overhears their plans, and decides to go to the college incognito, and work as a waitress, so as to see what the Prince looks like. Accordingly, she changes costumes with her maid, and leaves the castle surreptitiously.

Arriving at the college town, she gets a place as a waitress at an inn near the university. As she steps out of the carriage in front of the place, the boys gather around, and she is not a little embarrassed. At this juncture Prince Karl arrives and rescues her from the boys. Upon asking the innkeeper who her rescuer is, she receives the answer that he is the Prince of Rodenkurst. From then on Prince Karl spends a good share of his time at the inn where he can keep an eye on Victoria, with whom he has become infatuated. Soon after the barons arrive and put the proposition up to Karl. He refuses flatly to marry the Princess, whom he has not seen, and instructs the barons to inform his father that he loves only one Victoria, and will not marry the Princess. The barons use their persuasive powers in vain.

When Karl tells Victoria of the barons' visit, and its purpose, she makes him promise to go to Steinfeldt to the reception to see what the Princess looks like anyway. Then she quickly departs from the town. On the night of the reception Karl waits impatiently on the floor for the Princess. She enters in all her splendor. He does not even turn his head until he hears her voice in his ear, "Will you have a stein of beer" He turns. It is his own Victoria. He then is content to marry his peasant princess.

THE JARRS VISIT ARCADIA (Installment No. 6 of the Jarr Family Series—May 10).—Bringing home to his wife, for her new window box, a bunch of rose bushes, Jenkins, at the office has given him, Jarr's troubles commence the moment he comes near anyone. Carelessly wrapped and with the thorny stalks protruding a foot, he rakes all who get in his path, and after a particularly exasperating ride in the Subway, he arrives home angry and disgusted. To cap the climax, his wife tells him the rose bushes are no earthly use for a window box. He heaves them out the window; they land on Slavinsky, the glazier's bald head, and that gentleman retaliates by seizing Willie Jarr's air gun and hitting Jarr in the eye. Jarr then pushes window-box, dirt and all onto Slavinsky. Next day the Jarrs leave for their promised visit to Arcadia, the Jenkins' suburban home. The journey from the railroad depot in the ancient hack is a forerunner, and they find the "suburban home" a dilapidated cottage containing horrible chromo portraits and presided over by sour-visaged Mrs. Jenkins. Their hostess has evidently lost much of her early training in table manners, and when she uses a steel knife to cut lemons into a glass of water, then sips the concoction, her guests nearly have a fit. Then the chickens get into the garden and the Jarrs are pressed into service. Jarr vows that chasing a preased pig is mild and tame sport in comparison. That evening the Jarrs are taken to dine at a suburban cabaret, which turns out to be an "owl" lunch-wagon, and the "entertainment" a rube performer on the harmonica. The men are all deputized to raid a "gambling hall" which the constable has obtained wind of, and the posse finds some of the town's most respectable citizens recklessly betting a nickel, or even a dime, on the pernicious game of checkers then in progress More exasperating contretemps follow before the weary Jarrs finally get back to their comfortable Harlem flat.

THE GIRL WHO MIGHT HAVE BEEN (Special—Three Parts—May 11).—Firm in his belief in the existence of a Master Criminal, Detective Cheney announces his determination to run the scoundrel to earth. Liggett, the master criminal, publicly known as an eminently respectable gentleman of means, learns of Cheney's promise to "get him." Exerting his almost uncanny power upon Enid, his unwilling accomplice, he gives her an automatic with a silencer attached, and sends her to the detective's office to assassinate him. In an almost miraculous manner Cheney discovers the purpose of her visit and cooly frustrates it. Realizing the girl is not acting of her own volition, he gently draws from her the story of how—through no fault of her own—she has been forced to do Liggett's bidding. She refuses, however, to divulge the criminal's name. "Three-Fingered Lew," Liggett's right-hand man, learns Enid is about to "squeal" and also that she has fallen in love with the detective. At his master's order, "Three-Fingered Lew" gains admittance to Enid's home, and when Cheney, an hour later, arrives, he finds her dead with peculiar finger marks on her throat. The detective is almost crazed by grief, for that very evening he was about to ask her to marry him. Forcing himself to action, he notifies the police, and feeling positive from the fingerprints that it is the work of "Three-Fingered Lew," he secures the crook's photograph from the Rogues' Gallery, locates his man and arrests him. Lew supplies an alibi, through Liggett, and is released, but Cheney re-arrests him. With the aid of a famous hypnotist and the Third Degree, he gains a confession from Lew, incidentally implicating Liggett. The detective goes to Liggett's home, and after some thrilling adventures in that house of mystery, Liggett is killed by a fall from the roof. But there ever remains with the detective a vision of "The girl who might have been"—his wife.

WHEN A FELLER'S NOSE IS OUT OF JOINT (May 12).—When you have been the only little boy in the house, it is hard to share Daddy Jim and Mother Dear with a very new baby brother, who arrives without warning. Sonny finds it hard enough to keep quiet and mind the baby, but when Daddy devotes himself to the usurper and Mother apparently forgets Sonny's presence, he feels keenly the knife thrust of jealousy. He shows it, too, by sticking his tongue out at the baby whenever no one is looking. Mother tells Daddy how Sonny forgot to mind the baby when the street band came around, and he gravely asks him how he would feel if "Old Mr. Stork" had taken the baby brother back again. Sonny is apparently humble, but secretly decides that would provide a happy solution of his problems. In an old book he finds a picture of a stork perching on a barn with a baby wrapped in a bundle, hanging from its bill. This is right in line with his thoughts, so that night he sneaks into the nursery, wraps up the baby, and starts for the barn. Meanwhile, through the maid's carelessness, the nursery room catches fire and when Daddy and Mother, aroused by some passerby, attempt to climb the stairs, they are driven back by a burst of flame. Sonny, at the back of the house, hears the fire engines, and runs around to the front, still carrying the baby. While the men are frantically trying to restrain Daddy from rushing up the stairs, Sonny steps up behind him and shouts. With a cry of joy all turn and make a rush for the little fellow, showering caresses on him. The baby is discovered safe and sound and Sonny finds himself the hero of the hour.

TO SAVE HIM FOR HIS WIFE (May 13).—Fresh from the country, Mary obtains her first position in the big city at the newsstand in the lobby of a large hotel. Her quaint appearance and mannerisms become the subject of much ridicule among the young lady telephone operators and Eddie, the gossipy bell-boy. Robert Sundown, a young westerner, often buys papers at Mary's stand, and the acquaintance ripens into love. Eddie happens to see the picture of a beautiful woman in Sundown's watch and tells Mary her friend is married and carries his wife's picture in his watch. She refuses to believe him, so he maliciously changes the letters on an enveliope addressed to Mr. Robert Sundown, making it read: "Mrs. Robert Sundown." This he shows to Mary and she is broken hearted. Mlle. De Vries, an adventuress, succeeds in bringing Sundown within her influence. Mary sees how things are going, and determines to save the man she loves—for his wife—by outwitting Mlle. De Vries. She spends all her savings to purchase attractive finery and make herself beautiful, so that when Sundown sees her under the new conditions he becomes more madly in love with her than ever. He quarrels with Mlle. de Vries, and asks Mary to dinner that evening. The couple are seen by the manager and Mary is discharged for carrying on a flirtation with a hotel guest. Sundown sees her leaving the place weeping bitterly and follows her. When he attempts to comfort her and speak of his love, she repulses him, explaining she only went between he and the adventuress to save him for his wife. Sundown is rather bewildered until she mentions the envelope and picture in his watch. Then he eagerly explains the picture came from a cigarette package and he had even forgotten he had it, while the envelope was evidently tampered with. With a radiant smile and a sigh of relief, Mary nestles in Sundown's ready arms.

THE PROFESSOR'S PAINLESS CURE (May 14).—Waldo Emerson Peabody, a professor, has buried himself among books so long that they are to him as the air he breathes. He even has to be reminded that it is his wedding day, which in his usual absent-mindness, he has forgotten. Sitting in his library, with his hat still on and his umbrella raised, the housekeeper enters and, horrified, informs him he is to be married in twenty minutes. He rushes off to get dressed. The bride proves an exceptional young lady, in that she does not get the least ruffled when her husband-to-be does not show up; she knows he has probably forgotten, and sits down prepared to wait all day. The professor finally arrives, his dressing still in the process of completion. He has forgotten the ring, but a substitute is procured, then the marriage license is found as a book-mark, while his ticket and money are all in his other clothes. The bride makes up the money deficit. At the hotel he finds he has not mailed some important letters, goes out to do so, and starting back, finds he has forgotten the way, also the name of the hotel. A policeman helps him out by pointing out the fact he is standing right in front of it. Then he finds he can't remember the room number. He comes near being arrested for a sneak thief, but his wife gets him out of the scrape. The bride decides she doesn't care for a longer wedding trip, so they return home. Once settled there, they find the dance craze has struck the town and his wife insists upon him taking a long course in dancing. To be left in peace with his books again, the professor decides the only way to cure his wife of the dancing craze is to flirt with the girls with whom he dances. Mrs. Peabody discovers him making love to one of them, and with the words, "I think we have danced enough, dear, tonight," almost drags him home. Dancing is a tabooed subject in the professor's household thereafter.

THE VALLEY OF HUMILIATION (Special—Two Parts—May 15).—By the terms of her husband's will, Mrs. Hobart's remarriage to Lawyer Perrine causes her comfortable income to cease automatically, thus leaving her twenty-year-old daughter Rosemary dependent upon the charity of her stepfather. The girl feels her humiliating position keenly, and after several unpleasant incidents, Rosemary tries to find work in the city. Owing to her inexperience, the attempt is a failure. Discouraged, the girl returns home and upbraids her mother, who sharply replies she expected her daughter to marry long ago. Rosemary feels she can stand it no longer, and desperately resorts to advertising for a husband. The replies she receives are almost insulting, but one appears to be from a genuine man with honest impulses, so after a short correspondence, she starts for Prairie Hill, Colo., to meet Jim Aberdeen and become his bride. She finds him a fine type of young Westerner, with the true instincts of a gentleman. but the uncertainty and fear of her position overcomes her, so that she faints in his arms. With a keen appreciation of her feelings, Jim tells her he will consider her simply as a guest in his home—until she can learn to love him. In the bracing air of the open prairies, the girl's life is soon filled with sunshine, and her heart with love for her husband. But she is again plunged into the Valley of Humiliation when a scoundrel plays a clever trick on her, and gets away with a thousand dollars belonging to her husband. She rides after the rascal, but out in the desert he shoots her horse and escapes. Jim finds the girl wan-

ROAD O' STRIFE NO. 6—THE STRENGTH OF LOVE (May 10).—Having learned through the press of the murder charge against Abner Gray and of the quarantining of Dr. Duncan and his wife, Robert Dane hurries back to Elmhurst and directly to the Duncan home. He finds the forged note, and realizes that some danger threatens Alene. He sets out for the old mill, and when passing the county jail encounters Abner, who has been released, the prosecuting attorney realizing that, without Alene's testimony, he cannot even indict Abner. Dane shows the note and tells of his fears, and the two men hurry to the abandoned mill, arriving in time to hear Alene's despairing cries as she sinks in the stagnant water of the hidden pool.

Dane and Abner rush into the building, and are trapped by Clara as Alene had been. Clara then hurries away, seeking Gilbert Jerome. Gilbert is at the village hotel, having just returned from the performance of a characteristic deed. He cooly ignores the angry protests of certain villagers and informs them that the silver cup which he has taken is as much his as any one else's. Clara tells Gilbert that she has killed Alene, but that no one will suspect it was not an accident that caused the girl's death, and calms his rage by reminding him that his fortune is made safe by her act. Gilbert's satisfied greed salves his disappointed passion, and, with Clara, he takes the train for the city.

Meanwhile, the old mill has been the scene of an heroic sacrifice. Abner Gray, given more than human strength by his great love for Alene, his wife only in name, has saved her from apparently certain death, and at the same time restored Robert Dane to life, while he, despite efforts of Dane, perishes. Dane conducts Alene to the Duncan home, and learns that Clara and Gilbert Jerome have left the village. Alene is sorely grieved at the death of Abner, but it is a grief such as she would have felt for a well-loved brother, not a lover, and it is with a longing that is growing day by day that she wistfully whispers to herself, "Surely Robert Dane will take me now?" But Dane has blinded his own hungry heart, and does not understand.

A HOT TIME IN PUNKVILLE (May 11).—This is a cartoon picture. Rastus lands in his native town from a box car after a pleasant trip. The first thing that attracts his attention is a wonderfully well developed chicken who greets him at the door of the baggage room. Rastus resolves to capture the bird, but the chicken puts up a good fight and the robber has to content himself with an egg. Still pursuing his bent of crime, he turns his attention to a fine Jersey cow, but in this he is again disappointed, as the cow jumps over the moon. Rastus pursuing, gets badly mixed up with the stars. He finally gets down to earth and intrudes himself into a humble domicile just as the mistress in preparing for a bath.

WHO STOLE THE DOGGIES? (May 11).—Maggie, a cook, is courted by Murphy, a cop, and also receives attention from Hogan, the chief. She favors Murphy, which makes Hogan insanely jealous. One night the Rockerbilts give a party, but the function is marred by the discovery that the wienerwursts have been stolen. The police are notified and Hogan forthwith instructs his men to look out for the thief. Murphy is on the job and casually visiting Maggie, he sees her with a string of delicacies and though he loves Maggie, his duty compels him to arrest her. Hogan, seeing Murphy making for Maggie's kitchen, follows and finds Murphy with the wieners in his hand and arrests him. Presently the Rockerbilt's cook appears and exhibits another string of sausages which she had found the house dog chewing. The populace are aroused and they propose to hang Murphy. Maggie receives the wursts and escapes. The only rope available to hang Murphy is found to be too short and while the mob are hunting a better rope Maggie rushes up and explains matters. Murphy is released and the rope is transferred to Hogan, who is left dangling by his feet.

WHO BEARS MALICE (Special—Two Parts—May 12).—The marriage of George Colby and Adele Rogers is prevented by the closing of the lumber camp. George goes to a distant part of the woods as a trapper, where he incurs the enmity of Tom Weaver, who resents Colby's presence in the woods. Colby overcomes Tom in their first difficulty, and the ridicule which the other woodsmen heap upon him causes Tom to attack Colby in a saloon. The Judge of the district court warns them against further trouble. That night Tom steals to Colby's shack and tries to force him out. In a struggle, Colby is shot in the knee, and is only saved from death by the arrival of the police, who make Tom a prisoner. As a result, Tom is sentenced to a prison term, and the Judge warns Colby to leave the vicinity.

Colby learns that a new camp is opening, and returns to Adele. They are married and begin a happy life near the new camp. Tom is released from prison and tracks Colby, intent on vengeance. He reaches the cabin where he finds Adele. His suspicious actions and her intuition warn her that this is her husband's enemy. When Tom inquires for Colby she tells him that a man by that name did live here, but has moved and that she lives with her father, who will not allow her visitors. Tom is attracted by her beauty, and remains in the neighborhood. He comes each day while Colby is at work. Colby sees footprints, and his suspicions are aroused, though Adele protests that she has no visitors. When her husband finds a package of cigarette papers on the table Adele tells him that they were left by a tramp to whom she gave dinner. The next day Tom comes. Adele has devised a plan to get rid of him, and shows him a letter which she has written, but which is supposed to be from Colby, asking her to send him a coat which he left behind him. Tom sees a way to find his enemy, and says he will take the coat to the town which the letter gives as Colby's location. Adele goes to get the coat, but while she is gone, Tom finds a picture of Colby. The picture is signed "For my wife, Adele." Tom sees the truth, and when Adele returns, he confronts her with the picture. She is filled with terror, believing that Tom will find Colby and shoot him. Tom tells her that if she will leave with him, he will promise not to harm Colby.

Adele, knowing that Tom is in the woods unarmed, agrees to go, hoping to escape and return. Colby's suspicions grow, and he determines to return home. Tom and Adele are ready to leave. Adele pins a note to the door of an inner room, telling Colby what she has done. As the two open the door of the cabin, Tom sees Colby coming. He slams the door, and Tom fires all of the charges in his revolver through it. Colby is not hit, and with his woodsman's axe breaks in the door. Tom seizes the axe as the door falls and the two men struggle for possession. The interior of the cabin is wrecked. Colby finally secures the axe, but throws it from him. Tom draws a knife and the struggle is renewed for possession of the new weapon. At length Colby throws Tom from him. The man trips and falls on the knife. Colby seizes the axe and raises it to strike Tom, but Adele stops him. Then Colby looks at the man on the floor. He does not move. Colby turns him over. His own knife has killed him in the fall.

THE GRAY HORROR (Special—Three Parts—May 13).—Ellis, an English barrister, goes to a hotel, in answer to a note of appeal, to rescue a woman he had formerly loved from the influence of her husband, a crook, who mistreats her. He takes her safely away, but shoots and wounds Gray, her husband. They flee, followed by threats of vengeance from Gray. Parr, an adventurer, occupying the room adjoining, has, unseen, witnessed the shooting affray. Ellis flees with Gray's wife for America. On the first day out she dies in childbirth and pleads with him to adopt her babe. Ellis agrees. Parr, who happens to be on the same ship, knows of the death of the mother and the adoption of the child. Ellis is ignorant of Parr's identity.

Years later Ellis, happy with his ward, Betty, is in a secluded old mansion in America. He has never learned for certain whether or not Gray died and he is continually haunted by the thought that Gray might return. Parr, now an unscrupulous land dealer, visits Ellis's estate in an effort to purchase acreage which he knows to be rich in ore. He is astounded to recognize in Ellis the man whom he had seen shoot Gray 18 years before. Ellis flatly refuses to sell. Parr, angered, leaves, ready to employ a scheme to make Ellis leave the estate or sell it. Soon after, Betty is plunged into a state of constant fear by the growing terror of her old guardian. Betty sees and hears of a mysterious, ghostlike figure at nights and becomes convinced that her guardian is the victim of a frightful apparition, or fiend in human flesh. Nervous to the point of hysterics, she writes her guardian's young attorney, Briggs, to come to the mansion at Lone Willows. Briggs arrives, hears the strange story of the secret of the mansion, and resolves to stay until he has exposed the mysterious agent. He is not only unsuccessful, but in time becomes a haunted wreck, in as pitiable a plight as Ellis. Both men barricade the doors of the mansion.

Betty, unable to gain access into the locked rooms, hurries to the city, notifies the police and goes to the home of her school chum, Claire Parr, to spend the night. During the night she is astounded to see Claire's father leave the house with a crook, Hart, both with masks. Hurriedly she seeks aid from the police and follows the men. The police arrive at Lone Willows to find the mansion a mass of flames. Inside the house a desperate battle is in progress between Ellis and Briggs and Parr and Hart. The two haunted men, having discovered Hart and Parr entering the mansion through a secret passage, believe they at last have the opportunity to kill their mysterious enemies. The police force their way into the house. Ellis and Briggs are rescued but the two crooks perish in the fire. Later Ellis learns the truth—that Parr had employed Hart, a crook, to "haunt" the mansion so that Ellis would believe Gray was carrying out his threat to kill him and reveal himself as Betty's real father. In this way he hoped to force Ellis to vacate the estate. In reality Gray died after being shot by Ellis years before. The entire affairs is kept secret from Betty, and Ellis, now free for the first time from his hallucination, prepares to celebrate the wedding of Briggs and Betty.

WHAT MONEY WILL DO (May 14).—Josiah Manning, a sturdy, well-preserved man of 60, returns to the States after years of wandering in Alaska. A son, Paul Manning, 40 years old, his wife, a younger son, Fred, and an adopted daughter, Flora, live on a small farm in the middle west. Paul and his wife are discontented. They shamefully abuse their adopted daughter, Flora.

The girl and Chester Reed, one of Paul's brow-beaten farm-hands, are sweethearts. Josiah Manning writes Paul that he is returning home, expecting to be provided for in his old age. In order to test Paul, the old man gives the impression that he is a pauper. Paul ruthlessly turns the old man away, telling him to go to the poor farm. Flora, sympathetic, runs after Josiah Manning and gives him something to eat from the kitchen. Touched and gladdened by the deed of kindness, the old man buys a farm nearby and gives it to Chester and Flora, provided they allow him to live with them. The old man, instead of being a pauper, has brought back a large sum from Alaska. He deposits the remainder of his money in the bank at the country town, and settles down with Flora and Chester, who have married.

Paul and his family learn of the old man's wealth and try to make up with him. Josiah turns them from the house, declaring that they will never have a cent. Paul and Fred try to railroad the old man to the insane asylum in a desperate attempt to get his money. Josiah escapes, however, and draws all his money in bank notes from the bank with the intention of giving it to Flora. The old man is cornered by the pursuing Paul and Fred. Rather than let his ungrateful son seize the money, Josiah Manning burns the pile of bank notes.

THE SUBSTITUTE (May 15).—Billy Reeves visits a fashionable restaurant and soon has the place completely demoralized by his acrobatic comedy gyrations. Billy meets a charming young woman who is delighted to join him at his table, but when Billy proposes a dance, and the girl gladly accepts, she does not suspect that they will wreck the place before they finish. Billy collides with waiters bearing laden trays, comes into violent contact with stout dancers, and creates so much havoc that they are about to be put out when a skating match is announced.

Billy, of course, dons skates and mingles with the gay throng—so completely that employes have to pry him out of the mass of people he has bowled over with whom he has become hopelessly entangled. He hurries out with his girl and suggests a visit to his club where a boxing match is about to begin. But young Dawson wires he cannot meet his waiting opponent. The match would have been called off but for Billy's willingness to fight. In his inimitably ludicrous manner Billy scraps with his partner and knocks him out in a blaze of glory.

MEANS AND MORALS (Special—Two Parts—May 11).—Irma Carson and Frances Smith are two little shop girls who are forced to subsist on their salary of $6.00 a week. When the sundries are taken out, there is nothing left. Irma, urged by youthful appetite, craves a good, substantial meal, and in order to get it, goes out on the streets to accost men, taking the big chance that the man she meets will be the right sort. She meets Dick Hardy, who brings her to a restaurant. When he demands his pay, she lays the truth of the matter before him. She is a good girl, she is hungry and she took a long chance. Dick is the right sort. He escorts her to her room and on the way tells her he is a pickpocket. Then they separate and go out of each other's lives. Later, a woman shopper in the store in which Irma works, misses her pocketbook. Glancing quickly down the aisle she sees Dick stuffing it in his clothes. Dick is arrested. Irma sees the arrest and calls the manager, the shopper and others into the office. She tells the story of Dick and her. The manager is touched. The charge is dismissed and Dick is given a chance to make good. He does it and declares his love for Irma.

After they had been old friends for two weeks, Bob showed Elphye his bank book and she promised to marry him some day if she could steal the time from her hairdressers. He played the market harder than ever and switched from bull to bear. He bet all he had on a falling market and the doctor found him with a raving fever. When Bob woke up Annie was there. She'd been there all the time, but Bob didn't know it. Bob thought he was broke, so Elyphe left and Annie fell into $230,000 which Bob had cleaned in his sleep.

BIOGRAPH.

TOYS OF DESTINY (May 3).—Returning from a theatrical performance which she has attended in defiance of her father's veto, the deacon's daughter is attacked by a footpad and rescued by a wayfarer who turns out to be one of the actors. When her father casts her off the actor marries her. After their child is born he goes on a tour and does not return. At her wits' end, his wife leaves the baby on her father's doorstep, in the certainty that the stern old man will do "God's will." The deacon rears the foundling in place of his erring daughter. On his death the girl seeks her fortune in the city. Her inherited talent for acting brings her an engagement.

On the opening night a scrubwoman employed about the theater faints outside her dressing room and is revived by her. The woman sees on the dressing table a framed portrait of the deacon and recognizes it. Thus mother and daughter are reunited by accident. The manager, coming to summon the girl, who is holding the curtain, recognizes in the scrubwoman his long-lost wife, whom he has sought in vain after coming out of a hospital, to which he was confined as a victim of a street accident. He has climbed to the top of his profession, but life has been empty for him until now, when he reclaims his wife and daughter.

THE BLACK SHEEP (Special—Two Parts—May 4).—The excesses of his dissipated son, Philip, bring Simeon Carruthers to the verge of financial ruin. His efforts to reform Philip prove vain; they quarrel, and the boy leaves his father's house forever. In order to recoup his fortune Carruthers proposes to the rich widow Dallas. After their marriage the widow's son, George, returns from abroad. He is a rising young novelist. Carruthers is informed by a firm of solicitors that he has been appointed a guardian of his deceased brother's daughter, Clare, who inherits a fortune. The girl comes to live with him, and he determines that she shall marry Philip, for whom detectives, hired by him, are searching the city. Philip has fallen in with Stewart Routh, a gambler, whose pretty wife, Harriet, is of great assistance to him in fleecing young men. The gamblers cheat Philip of all his money and, when he discovers the trick, propose that he enter into partnership with them. He accepts and becomes active in the business. Clare falls in love with George—a circumstance which so displeases Carruthers that he plans to get rid of the novelist. He contrives to make George appear guilty of having stolen his pocketbook, and orders him from the house. George's novel is accepted and he receives advance royalties. He falls in with Philip, who introduces him to the Rouths. The partners cheat him at cards. He takes his loss so heavily that Philip pities him and returns his money. The Rouths do not approve of this, and a quarrel ensues, as a result of which Stewart Routh kills Philip. Suspicion is fastened upon George, and he is arrested. Clare, visiting him in prison, learns that he, coming upon the scene after the murder, found a button clasped in Philip's hand. She is on her way to question the Rouths when she meets a Salvation Army collector of old clothing, who has just received from the gambler's wife an overcoat with a button missing. The button matches those on the coat. As the police enter Routh's apartment he commits suicide. George is cleared.

THE MASTER OF THE SWORD (May 7).—The fencing master, on vacation, wins the heart of a pretty girl and deserts her. Her sister, an artist, is summoned to her deathbed, and, on learning the truth, vows vengeance on the man. Returning to town, she takes lessons from the fencing master and contrives to leave from time to time, in the most unexpected quarters, mysterious notes from "the Avenger." This system of persecution works on the man's guilty conscience so that he becomes unnerved. When she deems the moment propitious, she leaves a last warning: "Prepare to-night to meet the Avenger," and, wearing a mask, makes her way into his presence. Signing to him to defend himself, she attacks him pitilessly with his own weapon; a deadly duel ensues; the fencing master's sword is whirled from his grasp, and as he sinks to the floor, overcome by his fears, the Avenger strips off her mask. With a gasp he falls inert, and the girl, kneeling above him, feels that his heart has ceased to beat. Her sister's honor is avenged. But as she recoils from her victim she questions whether it had not been better that he live on and, in the iron grasp of conscience, meet a retribution even more terrible.

MASKED FATE (May 7).—She did not know that the audacious fellow who kissed her at the masked fete was her brother's chum. On a surprise visit to the town house she encountered a masked intruder, whom she threatened with a pistol after phoning for the police. Returning from the club, he had recognized her and, in a spirit of fun, he had put on the mask which he found in her traveling bag. Explanations were cut short by the entrance of a real burglar, whom the young man captured and turned over to the police. Then he kissed her again, and this time she was not angry.

A DAY'S ADVENTURE (May 8).—Over Bentley's shoulder, the crook read the lawyer's letter telling the young man of his inheritance. He immediately wired his pals. When Bentley arrived the girl scraped his acquaintance by the simple means of losing her bag, and decoyed him to the crooks' rendezvous, where he was overpowered, bound and gagged. The younger crook presented his credentals and was invited to spend a few days in the lawyer's house. That night he sought to burglarize the safe and was captured. Hagan, watching through the window, saw the need of quick action, waylaid the policeman on the beat and took his uniform. Thus disguised, he answered the call for help and bore his confederate off in triumph. The trick discovered, the lawyer went to the police station. There he met Bentley, who had wormed out of his bonds and escaped. Bentley led the police to the crooks' rendezvous, arriving just as they discover his escape, and after a struggle the crooks were captured.

Chambers's mother writes to her, suggesting that she adopt a child and then possibly her husband would become interested and spend more of his time at home. Gray, who spends all his money in drink, is refused further loans by Chambers. Mrs. Chambers suggests to her husband that they adopt a child and the husband consents. They call at the Gray home and meet the Grays' little son. Chambers writes Gray a letter in which he tells him that he will cancel Gray's indebtedness if he will permit him to adopt his child, and in addition will give the Grays a thousand dollars, providing they relinquish all claims to the boy.

Mrs. Gray is loath to give up her beloved little one, but Gray tells her that the child will grow up in luxury, and when he grows up he will thank his parents for the opportunity. The child is given to the Chambers and Gray proceeds to spend the thousand dollars in riotous living. Mrs. Gray, mourning over the loss of her child, becomes bedfast. The child is permitted to greet its loving mother and Mrs. Gray recovers her health. Mrs. Chambers comforts Mrs. Gray and finally comes to understand what it means to have a mother's true love.

Dixon, Jean's father, returns to Warner, who tells him what has happened. Together, they summon the other cattlemen and start to run down the Mexican. WHERE'S OLIVER?" (May 20).—The adoption of the "kindness to prisoners" system in Ting Ling Prison, about which much is written in the newspapers, is so vividly impressed upon Harry's mind that at night he dreams about it. His dream takes him to the prison windows through the bars of which he sees the "members" holding a singing club rehearsal. When the rehearsal becomes too strenuous the solicitous warden passes cigars and refreshments and takes other measures to make the poor downtrodden prisoners comfortable.

To Harry Ting Ling Prison is a haven of bliss and forthwith he makes application for membership. He is told that the only way admittance may be gained is to get "in dutch with the law" and this he immediately proceeds to do by pouncing upon an officer. But that worthy, being compassionate, refuses to arrest Harry. Next he tries rough-housing a cafe. The police come to quell the disturbance and cart off in the patrol wagon all the participants in the melee except Harry. Very much annoyed by the unexpected turn of events, but not at all dejected, Harry follows the wagon to the station and there tries to saw his way into paradise. In the midst of his operations he is commanded by the guard to "move on" as only real criminals are wanted in jail. Driven desperate, Harry steals a Flivver car and races through the streets and roads bowling down every pedestrian in his path. The police pursue him and when he is caught he is carted to jail. But alas and alack! In his frenzied flight with the Flivver he neglected to notice that he crossed the state line, and the warden of the prison in the adjoining state believes in anything but kind treatment. To the rock pile Harry is sent to work out his sentence. At this juncture his dream is interrupted by the fall of the ceiling. The plaster bath is uncomfortable but it is far better than a rock pile job, and Harry is happy that his jail experience was only a dream.

They leave again in a huff and the chef returns with a bomb, which he lights. The restaurant, cashier, the proprietor and the chef are buried in the ruins.

POKES AND JABBS (May 13).—The Pokes and Jabbs families, neighbors, live across the hall from each other in the same apartment house. The fearless Mr. Pokes is very much bossed by his wife, a suffragette, while Mr. Jabbs is the ruler in his own home. Mrs. Jabbs has just been presented with a new coat by her husband, and, meeting Mr. Pokes in the hall, asks his opinion of it. While Pokes is admiring the coat, his wife, hearing his voice in the hall, peers through the keyhole and mistakes his admiration of the coat for affection for Mrs. Jabbs. Jabbs, at the same time, also hearing voices in the hall, looks through the keyhole and decides to punish Pokes for his familiarity with his wife.

Jealousy is aroused in both families and Jabbs and his wife quarrel, the result of which is that she leaves to go to her mother. Mrs. Pokes leaves home to attend a suffragette meeting and Jabbs, learning of a mask ball, persuades Pokes to go as his escort. Jabbs dresses as a woman. Arriving at the hall, they learn that the ball has been postponed. Disgustedly, they start toward home. A policeman gives them quite a chase, but they elude him by dodging into a saloon. The kindly bartender gets in wrong by offering his services and when they beat a hasty exit through the side door, they are confronted by another policeman. Pokes gets rid of him in a peculiar fashion. after several mishaps they arrive home. Jabbs has forgotten his keys. Pokes, becoming brave immediately, offers to put him up for the night. They proceed to retire without removing their clothes.

The suffragette meeting being over, Mrs. Pokes returns. A horrible discovery meets her gaze upon entering her bedroom. Jabbs, in female attire, occupies her bed. Wild with rage, she rushes to the Jabbs apartment to inform Mr. Jabbs of his wife's actions. Jabbs, hearing the clatter on the door, beats it out the window to the fire escape. About this time, Mrs. Jabbs returns repentant. Entering her own apartment, she sees a woman lying on the couch and fails to recognize it as her husband. With a piercing shriek, she rushes to the hallway and faints. Jabbs again aroused, makes his exit through the window, and for the fire escape to the Pokes' apartment, begging Mr. Pokes to hide and protect him. Mrs. Pokes arrives on the scene and Jabbs makes for the hallway, but in so doing leaves his skirt clutched in the hand of Mrs. Pokes. Explanations follow, and what at first appeared to be a horrible catastrophe, turns out an innocent prank.

PROFIT AND LOSS (Two Parts—May 12).—Frederick Baxter, a wealthy Wall Street operator, falls in love with a famous beauty, who accepts him for the money and position that his wealth can give her, although she is in love with an artist, Van Kuran. Van Kuran is engaged by Baxter to paint her portrait. Grace, the sister of the former beauty, is secretly in love with Baxter but he fails to return the affection she bestows upon him. After the marriage, Baxter, who has been troubled with his eyes, becomes totally blind. Van Kuran, the artist, continues his attentions to Julia and she reciprocates them. He acts as her escort to public functions, leaving Baxter alone in his home.

Grace, the sister, lives in the same household, and, in a measure, is aware of the dual role her sister is playing. She continually prompts her married sister into doing little acts of kindness for her husband so as to keep Baxter in ignorance of the true situation. Baxter hears of a famous physician, whom he invites, and is told that he can be cured. He takes the treatment and his eyesight is restored. He is on the verge of telling his wife the wonderful news, but decides to surprise her by coming home and pretending blindness.

Upon his return, he finds Van Kuran, the artist, at his house and sees him kiss his wife good-bye. He also discovers that Grace is shielding her sister and keeping up the pretense as of old, Baxter, of course, forms the utmost contempt for his wife and continues to withhold the fact that his eyesight has been restored. He likewise discovers the beautiful character of her sister, Grace.

In the meantime, Julia and Van Kuran are growing more madly in love. They finally decide to elope. Julia, still believing her husband blind, thinks that she deceives him when she escapes, but he sees her going. He realizes the falseness of her nature and makes no attempt to restrain her flight. The eloping pair send a messenger with a note as they board an ocean steamer, and when the letter is delivered, Grace, the sister, is terribly agitated, but Baxter reveals to her that he has regained his eyesight, and that his eyes have been opened twice. He tells her that the loss is more than compensated for by the discovery of his love for her.

FATE'S ALIBI (May 16).—Ruth Hope is a cartoonist on "The Times," and, while riding on the street car one day, sits next to James Daggett, a down-and-outer. She sees in him excellent material for a heart interest cartoon. Daggett admires the girl and notices as she sits looking out of the car window her purse slips to the floor. He is tempted not to tell her. They come to the street where Ruth wants to leave the car, and, rising hurriedly, she leaves, forgetting the purse. Daggett picks it up and again being tempted, does not return it to the owner. With the money in the purse, he rehabilitates himself and finds that with outward respectability comes success. He obtains a position.

At home, that evening, Miss Hope discovers the loss of her purse and is indignant. There is no way to identify the thief except her remembrance of his face. She makes a sketch of the man as she remembers him and places it in the hands of the police. With Daggett's success comes remorse. He finds a card in the purse with Miss Hope's address upon it and writes her a letter, explaining his situation at the time and his temptation; also the results, obtained with the money now that he is able to do so. Miss Hope receives the money and is sorry that she has been so hasty. The police nab Daggett and call upon Miss Hope to identify him. She shows them the letter Daggett has written her and the sergeant thereupon dismisses the prisoner. Daggett then has the pleasure of escorting Miss Hope to her home.

A SHOT IN THE DARK (May 11).—Captain Holmes and his wife, Helen, live happily at Fort Easter. They are the favorites of the regiment and the captain takes charge of all entertainments of the regiment and is also in charge of the athletic sports. A ball is given in honor of Major Nevins, who has just arrived at the Post. When Helen was a mere school girl she fancied herself in love with Nevins and wrote him a number of undated letters. Renewing his acquaintance at the ball, Nevins makes himself decidedly offensive and taunts her with the letters.

The next night, while Holmes is at headquarters, Helen receives a letter from Nevins saying that, if she will come to his rooms at once, he will give her the letters. Helen goes to Nevins' apartments and instead of giving her the letters he taunts her. Holmes, who has been directed to deliver an order to Nevins enters the house unannounced, the front door being open. As he is about to make his presence known, he hears his wife's voice and listened at the portiers. Helen pleads. Nevins insults her.

A shot comes from behind the portiers and Holmes staggers into the room, his revolver falling to the floor. Nevins falls dead. At the trial, Saka, Nevins' Japanese servant, confesses that he killed Nevins to avenge the honor of his sister. His testimony explains how the shooting was accomplished.

AN IDYL OF THE HILLS (Two Parts—May 13).—Kate Graham is the belle of Breathitt County, Kentucky. In love with her are two young mountaineers, Lafe Jameson, leader of the dread Jameson clan, and Dick Massey, a man of finer sentiments. Dick is trying to learn to read so that he can leave the hateful mountain country with its life of crime and poverty and go out into the world and make good. He necessarily carries on his studies in secret, however, as that sort of thing is discouraged in the mountains. One day Kate surprises him studying his primer and ridicules him. Dick is so hurt by her tirade that he hides his book under a log and temporarily abandons it. Proceeding on her way Kate comes across a real "Furriner," who is in the mountains spending her vacation. She saves him from being bitten by a snake, but when he tries to thank her, she runs away from him. He so impresses her that she is ashamed of her ignorance and slipping into the woods, steals Dick's books and begins the study of them. She can make no progress with the printed matter, but is delighted with the pictures.

Later she meets the "Rurriner" and they become very friendly. Lafe, becoming jealous of this friendship and mistaking Collins' sentiment, undertakes to whip the "Furriner." He meets with the surprise of his life and immediately changes his mind when he tries to put his plan in operation. Seeing that his attentions to the girl are likely to have a serious result and wishing to avoid it, Collins writes a curt note to Lafe. informing him of his disinterestedness in the girl and speaking of her ignorance and position in life in no uncertain tone. When the note is delivered to Lafe, he is with the girl, and she, thinking the note is for her, opens it. She is unable to read it and submits it to Lafe for perusal. He being unable to decipher it, takes it to Collins' camp and asks for a translation. He decides that the truth will be best and tells her the contents of the note. She flies into a rage.

Meanwhile Lafe has called a meeting of the clan and convincing them that Collins is a Revenuer there to collect evidence, has them pass sentence of death upon him. The lot of excutioner falls to Dick. He starts for Collins' camp and meets Kate, who tells him the tale of the "Furriner's" insult and declares her intention of killing him. Dick promises to settle with him and goes to the camp of the "Furriner." Arriving there he is struck with the sincerity of Collins' explanation and starts away from the camp. He is halted by the sound of a gun shot and looking back sees Collins writhing on the ground wounded. Dick confesses to the shooting when Lafe falsely accuses him, but luckily, Collins regains consciousness and explains that he accidentally shot himself. Hearing this and realizing the sincerity of his love, Kate surrenders to the faithful Dick and they study the primer together.

The Absentee

The Victim

Mr. Business Man—
I dare you to see this moving picture.

Dare you to go look at yourself on the screen!

Dare you to take your wife and daughter—and "the boy"—to see what is happening all about us in business every day.

"The Absentee," a fine, big Master-Picture, with Robert Edeson in the title rôle, puts business before you like a beetle with a pin through it.

Go look yourself over. See the beautiful, glittering wings of you—but don't be blind to the claws (that may not be what naturalists call them, but you understand me, I'm sure)!

I looked at the picture of an April afternoon—when my mind was not over-active. Then I went and walked around the park—and didn't realize it was raining!

"The Absentee" is that kind of a picture. It gives you a mental Turkish bath, then rubs your conscience down with a rough towel. It's a great picture to see. Full of very beautiful scenes—interspersed with some that have prongs in them.

And you get to the office next morning with a new point of view and more vim and vitality than you've had for a long time.

Yes, Mr. Business Man,—go to see "The Absentee." There's not a dull inch of film in the 48,000.

Most of us Americans are business men—whether we are clerks or work at a bench or follow a plough.

Personally—aside from the pleasure of looking at it—I got a lot out of the picture. I'm pretty sure you'll get a lot, too. Go to see

THE ABSENTEE—produced by the Majestic Motion Picture Corporation—with Robert Edeson.

And, oh, papa dear,—how sweet she is when she cries!

And there you are!

A young girl in a moving picture theatre whispers a half dozen words to her father—and, in a breath, you know more than I could tell you in pages of Mae Marsh, the heroine of this week's second Master-Picture—"The Victim."

Just think of all that means!

What amazing charm and magnetism and, as the little girl said, "sweetness" it takes to show through a veil of tears. I suppose thousands and thousands of people have come actually to love Mae Marsh from just seeing her on the screen.

But, bless me!—here's half my space gone and I've told you nothing of "The Victim."

It's not a big production—or very long. It runs just short of an hour. But such a wholesome, well filled, solid, substantial hour!

There's a fine young hero (Bobby Harron;—he is, or ought to be, a friend of yours, too) and a very real, very villainous villain.

And plenty of excitement—oh, plenty.

And an ending where dreams come true. (The heroine cries again there—but that time for happiness—and she is sweet.)

Yes—it's a good picture; the kind you could whistle if it were music.

And—

You'll want to see it again.

There aren't many better moving pictures about than

THE VICTIM—with Robert Harron and Mae Marsh.

And whether you pay 10c or a quarter or a dollar to look at it—you will be mighty glad you spent the money!

A good many people have written, asking where they can see Mutual Master-Pictures.

Frankly—the rush for them since people began to find out how good they are has put us away behind in our bookings.

The surest way is to have a chat with the man in the box office at the theatre you usually go to. Ask him to get them for you regularly—and to let you know when he is to show them.

He will—if you say to him: "I want to see

"THE VICTIM" is not a long picture, but its three reels carry a story full of human interest—of self sacrifice, of love, and of a struggle to do right in the face of great obstacles.

Bobby Harron is the expert locksmith, wrongfully accused and imprisoned for robbing a safe.

As advertised in the

He escapes from prison—a bit of realism your audience will enjoy. Later he locks three burglars, one of them his nemesis, in a bank vault.

The burglars fight among themselves, in the vault (another extremely exciting scene).

In the end, all turns out well for Mae and Bobby.

And if you watch the faces of your patrons as they file out of your theatre, you'll notice many red eyes—and you'll suspect—no, you'll know they have been crying.

Yes, very modern—

Labor difficulties, militia, riots —are shown with a vividness that almost chills—so true are they in their realism.

a surgeon's scalpel, they still remained united by suggestive mentality. No matter what physical sensation one experienced, it was reciprocated by the other.

One of the boys falls in love with the daughter of a French officer then stationed in Corsica, and when he is transferred to Paris, taking his daughter with him, he is shortly followed by the ardent youth. He learns, with dismay, on his arrival there, that his adored one has been married to an elderly naval officer, who is about to sail on an extended cruise, leaving his young bride at home.

Louis makes it his business to watch over her like a mother. Notwithstanding his vigilance, she is ensnared into a compromising position by a famous duelist and libertine, Chateau Renard. Louis interposes to save her, and for his temerity is killed in a duel that follows. At the moment of his death, Fabian, his brother, is in his native mountains hunting, and, feeling a sharp pain in his side, places his hand there only to find it covered with blood, although there is no trace of a wound.

He hurries home and tells his mother of the singular occurrence and while he is relating it, a vision of the duel appears. He immediately journeys to Paris, meets Chatoau Renard, fights and kills him, and then returns to Corsica with his brother's body.

A STOOL PIGEON'S REVENGE (May 12).—Hank congratulated himself on a scheme whereby he calculated to discourage all rivals. The rivals did not get discouraged, however, and when the gang went to rob a house, Hank told the cops. They grabbed the crooks and Hank grabbed the girl. He also attempted to go back and cop the swag, but he did not know his pals had broken out of the cooler in the meantime and were coming back also.

Neither did he realize they were going to carry off the trunk he had hidden in. Unluckily, they did this but the cops protested about going off with other folks' belongings. They used pistols also, and Hank got in the way of the bullets inside the trunk. The crooks finally got away but found Hank inside and gave him the time of his life. The swag was last in the shuffle.

A STRANGER IN CAMP (May 14).—Archibald Bait, while visiting with an old chum in a North woods town, goes out on a big time with him and refuses to be taken home when his friend thinks he has had enough. Bait, in a struggle, to free himself from his friend's detaining hand, strikes him down with his cane. Thinking that he has killed him, Bait flees in terror. The next morning, still running away, he meets an Indian chief in the woods. Bait, in full evening dress, is a strange object to the Indian, as is the Indian to him. Each runs from the other, badly frightened.

Bait comes to a lumber camp and seeks rest. The boss is in love with his foreman's daughter and the cook is extremely jealous, and on seeing them making love, faints and falls under the table. Dinner time comes and the cook is missing. Bait is made the cook. A sheriff arrives during dinner and talks of the escape of a convict murderer. Bait thinks he means him and hides in the girl's room, frightening her. She shouts for help. The boss runs in. They fight and in the struggle bump against a curtained corner. The escaped convict-murderer jumps out from his hiding place and after a struggle, escapes into the dinner hall where the lumber jacks capture and bind him.

Bait returns to his cooking. The fire is low. Bait pours oil into the stove. It blows up and he is knocked down. The hands run in and find him speckled with soot. Thinking he has smallpox they run him out of the camp. He runs to town and finds his chum uninjured.

WANTED—A CHAPERONE (Two Parts—May 7).—Jack and his father live at the beach; Eddie and his mother live in the city, while Lee, Eddie's pal, lives alone. Eddie invites Jack for a visit and on the way to the city, Jack meets two young ladies, Victoria and her sister. Jack and Victoria's sister leave the train at a country station to pick flowers and are left behind as the train pulls out, leaving Victoria on the train alone. Eddie and his friend, Lee, go to the station to meet Jack, but he is not among the incoming passengers. Victoria overhears their conversation which leads her to believe that the young man they are expecting is the one who is left behind with her sister. She volunteers the information, which the boys accept gladly and all leave for the country station where the pair was left, rescue them and bring them back to the city.

Eddie and Jack become great friends with the girls and Jack proposes they all go down to the beach together. Jack writes his father asking to be allowed to invite the girls to come back with them. Father replies to the letter, consenting with the provision that they secure Eddie's mother as chaperone. All are delighted and Eddie goes to ask his mother's consent. She, however, has just received a telegram which calls her to the bedside of Eddie's uncle, who is seriously ill. The boys are in a quandary. Eddie seizes upon a scheme of making Lee up as Eddie's mother to thus pacify Jack's father at the beach. They figure their scheme will be a success as the two have never met.

Lee proves a rather stubborn chaperone, but is well received by the girls, who immediately take a great liking to him, to the great disgust of Jack and Eddie. Upon their arrival at the beach, Jack's father immediately falls in love with Lee (disguised as Eddie's mother), which leads to many peculiar situations. Eddie's real mother returns home, her patient having been pronounced out of danger and leaves for the beach to join the boys. Complications follow, and, of course, Lee is found out. Jack's father easily switches his affections to the real mother and after explanations, all are happy.

HE FELL IN THE PARK (May 11).—Mr. Crabb has a wife who is addicted to flirting. A young novelist receives a letter from a woman admirer who signs herself Alice R., and who makes an appointment with him in Golden Gate Park, San Francisco. The novelist and Alice R. start out to keep the appointment. As a stranger passes the apartment house of Mr. and Mrs. Crabb, the latter flirts with him; whereupon Mr. Crabb who has seen the action, sets out with his wife to make an example of the stranger. Meanwhile, Alice R. has arrived at the park with the novelist. Mr. Crabb has a fight with the stranger and is knocked down for his pains.

The Crabbs continue on and go for a stroll in the park. The novelist mistakes the wife of Mr. Crabb for Alice R. and speaks to her. Mrs. Crabb in the meantime has been flirting with another man and her husband goes for a policeman. The novelist and Mrs. Crabb chat for a few moments and then the latter suddenly leaves him on seeing her husband in the distance. Alice R., who has been taking a glass of soda, leaves the fountain and comes upon the novelist. The latter is doubly surprised to meet her. Mr. and Mrs. Crabb become separated and Mr. Crabb mistakes Alice R. for his wife. Several amusing situations follow in rapid sucession, in which Mr. Crabb is nearly arrested. Husband and wife return home, while the novelist again meets Alice R. and tells her that she was the inspiration for his novel.

FOLLOWING FATHER'S FOOTSTEPS (May 14).—Father writes to his son and tells him that he has taken another wife and would like to have him meet her. The girl, unknown to her mother, has made a "flirting" acquaintance with the son, who is working in the same town where she is attending school. The girl, too, gets a letter from her mother telling of her marriage. Lee decides to seek the girl for consideration. Meanwhile, in the school where the girl is studying an epidemic of measles breaks out. All the pupils are sent home. Lee is disappointed and decides that it can't be worse at home and leaves to visit his stepmother and father.

The girl arrives in her new home and is joyfully greeted by her mother, but finds her stepfather is not at home. Lee, coming home, is overcome with joy when he sees the girl he has been thinking of at his home, although he can't understand how she came to be there. The girl, too, sees him and is pleasantly surprised. Shortly after Lee comes in, his father arrives and takes Lee in to meet his new mother. They find her in the garden. Lee greets his new "mother" affectionately, in fact he embraces her and is kissing her, when the girl comes out to get her bearings. She sees Lee in his greetings and takes it for granted that he is her new "father."

The mother tells Lee that she would like to have him meet her daughter. They go in and she calls her daughter to come down that she has a surprise for her. But the girl absolutely refuses to come down to meet her new "father." After a great deal of argument on the part of the whole family she is brought out and imagine her joy and surprise to find that Lee is not her "father."

The old man takes Lee to one side and tells him that he should take an example from his father and get a good wife. The minute father and his new bride turn their back Lee fully follows in father's footsteps.

nephew of a very dear friend of Simpson's, he is doubly welcome. When Hardy meets Lindsay he recognizes in him the son of a lumberman for whom he used to work, who thrashed and discharged him for whipping a small boy. Ill feeling is rekindled on being introduced to Carl and he determines to avenge the wrong done him and endeavors to ruin Carl.

His opportunity for this revenge arrives when he learns that Marie, Simpson's daughter, and Lindsay are growing to admire each other. Later, when Simpson is called away to Chicago, leaving Lindsay in complete charge, Hardy determines to act. Marie has promised Lindsay that she will marry him when the dam is finished. Hardy, learning this, determines that the dam shall be built with a weak mixture of concrete and lays his plans accordingly. Being in charge of the construction work and the hiring of the men, he employs three ex-foremen who will do his bidding, and, while Lindsay is exercising all his energy to erect the dam in a satisfactory manner and each day growing more deeply in love with Marie, Hardy is working hard with his associates to see that the dam is built in such a way that it will not stand the pressure of water they anticipate turning into it.

When the great dam is completed, Lindsay looks on his work with pride, little dreaming that at the same time at another part of the dam, Hardy is looking with great satisfaction at the water which is beginning to seep through the poorly constructed wall of concrete. A few hours later, Lindsay meets Marie. He tells her of the completed dam and reminds her of her promise. In her confusion, she calls to her dog, who has run to the wall of the dam and is drinking the treacherous water seeping through. Lindsay's attention is attracted to the dog and he makes the discovery that the wall is crumbling. He orders Marie to get the men from the mill and tries to prop up the crumbling concrete. Marie gets the men, among whom is Hardy and his associates in crime, and they all rush to the wall in an apparent effort to stop up the weakened places, but the wall gives way, carrying Lindsay, Hardy and the others in its wake. Marie succeeds in rescuing Lindsay from the wreckage, but Hardy and the others are carried off in the onrush.

Lindsay and Marie secure horses and ride madly to the village in the valley below the dam, where they arrive in time to warn the settlers, who climb to higher ground and look back on their homes being carried off in the mad rush of the deluge. Marie and Lindsay ride on with the maelstrom and see Hardy and the other men clinging to wreckage in a struggle to save themselves. Hardy loses his grip and is about to succumb, when Lindsay makes a mad dash into the raging torrent and succeeds in rescuing his enemy. In the meantime Simpson has returned from his business trip to learn of the great disaster. Lindsay and Marie bring Hardy to her father's home, where Simpson begins to reprimand Lindsay for constructing such a dam, when Hardy, realizing that Lindsay saved his life, exonerates Lindsay by telling Simpson that he alone was responsible and why he purposely ordered a weak mixture of concrete in an effort to avenge on Lindsay a great wrong Lindsay's father had once done to him. Simpson forgives Lindsay, who looks to Marie for a fulfillment of her promise.

JOKER.

NOTHING EVER HAPPENS RIGHT (May 15).—The young author in his study is vainly seeking a new plot for a story. He picks up a paper and sees an ad in which "The Avalanche Motion Picture Company" offers a $10,000 prize for a novel photoplay. He shows all the symptoms of being bit by the "scenario bug." With the $10,000 bait before his eyes he seeks for a plot in earnest and decides to go out for a walk, and look around. He wanders into the Mexican portion of town and, seeing a restaurant, decides to go in and eat. While at the table, he writes down everything he sees. A beautiful young Mexican girl with a large cloak, comes in and lays her cloak aside. She gets in an argument with the two waiters, who are dressed like bandits, and they have quite a scrap. The melee happens near the author's table. One of the waiters sees that the author has written all over the menu card and, finishing on that has filled the table cloth with writing. He, too, is drawn into the scrap and in the mixup gets away with the girl's coat. He returns home. His wife comes in, sees the coat and, questioning her husband, learns where it came from. She admires it very much and decides to wear it for a little walk.

While worrying about her going out with the girl's coat, the author falls into a troubled doze. In his dream he imagines she comes back to him, wakes him and they go out together searching for a plot. They wander into the restaurant and are eating when the Mexican girl with the long cloak comes in and hangs her cloak near the one belonging to his wife. It happens that the girl and her father have escaped from Mexico, with the plan to a lost mine and are closely pursued by two bandits, who are acting as waiters. She sees them and decides to take the cloak belonging to the author's wife and thus escape them. She gets by them in the coat and when the author and his wife come out with the girl's cloak they are pounced on by the bandits.

They try to rob her, but, unsuccessful in that, decide to kill her, but each time something happens that prevents the execution. The author, recognizing the splendid material for a melodrama, encourages them and insists on his wife complying with their demands. At last she tires of the attempts and decides to try her own hand at killing and there is "some fight." He complains that nothing ever happens right but when wife turns the aggressor things happen fast and furious. The bandits run and hubby is knocked out and sent to the hospital. The two bandits tug and pull at him while he is helpless in their efforts to find the lost plans. They are about to kill him when he awakes and finds the two waiters from the restaurant shaking him. He thinks the dream was real, until they explain that they have come for the girl's cloak, which he took by mistake. All is straightened out and they leave. At last the author has his plot and needless to say, he wins the prize which affords him some consolation for the harrowing experience he had in his dream.

WHEN BRAINS ARE NEEDED (Two Parts—May 16).—Old Tom Sharpleigh has been discharged because of his old age, and he is without money. Agnes, his granddaughter, is dependent upon him. She gets employment, much against the old man's will, in the home of Marian Danforth, who takes a dislike to the girl when she finds she knows her betrothed, Henry Edwards.

Marian does not like the idea of her sweetheart knowing a servant girl. He presents Marian with a rich necklace. No one knows of it being in the house but Harry, Marian and Agnes. That night, Joe, the ourang outang escapes from his cage, and, entering Marian's room, steals the necklace and returns to his cage. His master, Bill Barstow, an associate of criminals, finds the necklace and decides to sell it. Agnes is accused of the crime and arrested. Her grandfather begs to see the room the crime was committed in, and Hoyt, the detective, humors the old man, whom he considers almost in his dotage. The old man sees the monkey's handprint, but Hoyt laughs at it, and shoves him from the house.

The old man traces the footsteps to the Zoo and follows Barstow to a low quarter of the city. Then he goes to headquarters and asks for police to search the house, but is laughed at again. But Henry, the donor of the necklace, who has visited headquarters to induce Agnes to tell where she hid it, is interested in her and in the old detective and accompanies him to the den where they are discovered by the crooks. Henry is overpowered and they are about to kill him, when the old detective, who has stolen away, arrives with a policeman. The crooks are mastered and the necklace regained.

They return to headquarters and the girl is released. The chief tells Tom to come back to work, for brains are needed at headquarters. When the old fellow arrives the next day, he finds his desk ornamented with flowers and white ribbons. He goes back to work. It also looks, as the story ends, as if a romance is developing between Henry and Agnes.

charge of the games, although crooked, has never been found out. His daughter is forced to give him help in his calling.

The bartender gives Ned a letter he has been holding for him. It is from his mother and informs him, that unless he can send her $500, she will be forced to let their home go to satisfy the demands of the deacon's mortgage. Ned realizes he has not this amount in gold dust and is thoroughly disheartened. As a final resort he is tempted to gamble at the girl's table. He, of course, loses and is more disheartened than ever. He joins his friends at the bar, and they charitably allow him to drink himself into insensibility, not, however, before he has learned that the girl and her father are suspected of being the cleverest cheats in the business, although the charge has not been proven. The girl feels sorry for the man she has fleeced, but sees no other way. Suddenly, looking upon the floor, she sees the letter Ned dropped. She reads it, and her heart is awakened to a deeper pity than it has ever known before. Without a word to her father she leaves the gambling hall.

On her way to their shack, she comes across Ned in a drunken stupor. She conducts him to her little cabin. When he has sunk into troubled slumber, she quietly leaves, and going to the telegraph office sends by telegraph all the gold she has to Ned's mother. Returning to the cabin, she sits beside him until morning. When he awakens, all the anger in his nature is aroused at sight of her, and denouncing her as a cheat and a thief, he leaves the place. Ned returns to his friends at the saloon. He is about to begin drinking again, when a boy from the telegraph office enters and hands him a telegram from his mother, thanking him for the $1,000 received. He questions his friend, whom he suspects of having sent the money, but the latter denies entirely, having anything to do with it. The gambler calls at his daughter's shack and demands her winnings of the night before. She tells him she lost the sack containing her dust and nuggets. He does not believe her and a violent quarrel follows. Ned, passing by outside, overhears the quarrel and saves the girl from the man's anger. Things are explained and Ned realizes what a sacrifice the girl has made. Further up the street the miners have held an important indignation meeting and decided to drive the gambler, who, they are convinced is a cheat, from town. He is forced to obey their commands and flees into the desert. Back in the rude cabin, Ned and the girl come to an understanding.

BISON.

THE BLOOD OF HIS BROTHER (Two Parts—May 8).—John Holden, president of the Trans-Continental Railroad, discovers that his daughter, Grace, is admired by his private secretary, Wilson Wright, which fact greatly agitates him, as he has already selected a suitor for his daughter in the person of Raymond Kingsley, a wealthy broker. In order to separate them, Holden sends Wright to take charge and act as his representative in Wilcox, a small station in Wyoming. On the day of Wright's departure Grace secretly meets him at the depot and her farewell is a promise to remain true to their devotion until he returns to claim her. En route to Wilcox, Wilson's train is held up by two bandits and the passengers relieved of their possessions. The bandits succeed in making their escape and the train proceeds. One of the bandits, who proves to be Wright's brother, Jack, discovers, on examining the loot, his brother's gold watch which contains a picture of their mother, together with a letter she has written to Wilson, inquiring the whereabouts of her beloved son, Jack. The mother's letter and photograph have such an effect upon Jack that he determines to reform, and visit his brother at Wilcox. On his way there, however, his horse becomes lame, and upon investigation, Jack discovers that his horse has picked up a gold nugget, which has wedged itself in its shoe. He retraces the trail he has traversed and discovers a rich ledge. He brings this information to his brother in Wilcox, and confesses that he was the bandit who held up the train and acquaints his brother with his desire to reform.

Jack learns that Wilson has received a letter, informing him that Holden's object in sending him West was to separate him from Grace. With the indignation this letter has aroused still in his mind, Wilson decides to back up his brother's reformation by helping him develop his prospect. In a short time the brothers strike it rich, and before a year passes, a booming mining town, bearing their name, is added to the state of Wyoming. Wilson has refrained from acquainting Grace with his good luck and prosperity, having absolute faith in her love for him.

In the meantime, Holden has urged his daughter to accept Kingsley as her husband. This Grace has refused to do, and in the hope of locating Wilson, she persuades her father to make a trip West, to investigate his properties. Acting on his daughter's advice, Holden decides to make the trip West, and invites Kingsley as his guest. They arrive in the vicinity of Wilcox at the time of an anniversary celebration. A number of Indians participate. The Indians become intoxicated and leave the merry-makers to return to the reservation.

At a sharp turn in the road, Holden's special runs down two of the Indians, killing them instantly. The rest of the band become enraged and attack the train, imprisoning Holden and his party. Grace, who is an expert horsewoman, manages to escape from the car and reaches Wrightville. To her great surprise and joy, she comes face to face with Wilson, whom she hastily informs of the attack. Wilson loses no time in rounding up a number of cowboys and miners, who go to the rescue. The Indians are overcome, and Holden, who has had an opportunity to observe the cowardice of his prospective son-in-law, Kingsley, is forced to acknowledge the superiority of Wilson. Kingsley, who has been seriously wounded in the conflict, consents to Grace's appeal to marry the man of her choice.

THE SMUGGLER'S LASS (Two Parts—May 15).—Sheilla and Bryan are Irish sweethearts. Bryan is a smuggler, an occupation which causes his pretty sweetheart no end of worry. Bryan tells her that if he succeeds in running a lot of brandy through they will be able to marry without fear of want. Donald Dhu overhears the remark and plans to win the one hundred pounds offered for information leading to the apprehension of the smugglers. Sheilla sees Donald and thinks he is up to some mischief. She follows him and sees him enter the castle where the soldiers are quartered. Through a friendly fishmonger, from whom she borrows some fish, it is made possible for her to pass successfully the sentry standing guard at the castle gate. She overhears Donald give his information regarding what will happen that night. Sheilla hastens to warn her sweetheart, but even then he is busy helping unload the forbidden brandy. The soldiers are on their way and surround the smugglers just as Sheilla has arrived with her warning. Bryan sends his sweetheart out of danger and he and the smugglers put up a brave fight, finally escaping in the darkness.

Next morning, Donald, knowing that Bryan will most likely go to see Sheilla, tells the soldiers and they set out for the cottage where Sheilla and her mother live. Bryan is there with Sheilla. Sheilla's mother is outside the cottage and sees Donald approach, he having been sent ahead by the soldiers. She instantly surmises his purpose and by her loud talking outside the cottage endeavors to warn those within. She is successful and Sheilla hides Bryan in the chimney. When Donald enters the cottage, he finds Sheilla apparently alone and sweeping up the floor. Unfortunately, Bryan, in the chimney, is forced to sneeze. Donald hears him and immediately knows Bryan is hidden away in the chimney. He pretends to innocently pile turf on the fire and Bryan is finally forced to descend into the room.

A fight follows between Bryan and Donald, which is ended by the entrance of the soldiers who have surrounded the cottage outside. Bryan is placed under arrest and borne off to the castle and imprisoned. Sheilla racks her brain to save her sweetheart. She prepares some loaves of bread and a fresh pat of butter, which she takes to the castle and finally succeeds in giving them to Bryan. Opening the loaf, he finds therein a rope. He makes his escape through the cell window and down the castle wall and by previous appointment, meets Sheilla and her mother and they set out for France.

THE BLACK BOX (9th Installment—Two Parts—Released week of May 3—Subtitle, "Lost in London").—As Lady Ashleigh, her professor brother-in-law, and Quest, the great detective, are about to sit down to breakfast in Hemblin House, Lady Ashleigh having become impatient waiting for his lordship, the valet runs excitedly into the room and announces that Lord John has been murdered. They go to his lordship's chamber where they stand in breathless silence. Suddenly the detective's keen sense of hearing detects a sound in the hallway below. Quest is astonished to see the gamekeepers holding Craig, whom they had caught in a pitfall trap. The professor tells the gamekeepers to put the prisoner in the impregnable wine vault, pending the arrival of the Scotland Yard men. Before being brought into the vault, Craig was shoved into the room where the dead man lay, and there he uttered an almost inaudible confession.

In London the Scotland Yard men are having considerable difficulty in rounding up a band of criminals who are decoying young women from the streets to be sent to South America. Lenora has received a reply from her aunt saying that she will expect her at her new residence at 9 o'clock the next morning. A heavy fog settles over the city of London and Lenora loses her way. She seeks information in a tea shop. There she is accosted by a woman connected with the girl-trapping clique who says that the house Lenora is seeking is next to the one where she lives. Lenora accepts the woman's offer to take her to the house, and she is imprisoned immediately upon entering.

The next day, Quest, the professor and Lord Edgar Ashleigh go to London in response to a wire from the dead lord's attorney. Quest is alarmed at not finding Lenora at the hotel, and no trace can be found of her. He goes to Scotland Yard, and is informed that the chief is about to make a raid on a house which they suspect is the rendezvous of the girl-trappers. Quest receives permission to go along. He approaches the house in an apparently inebriated condition, and so soon as the door is opened, pushes inside, quickly followed by the Scotland Yard men. Above the noise, Quest recognizes the shrieks of Lenora, and, after many hazardous attempts, rescues her. The whole band is trapped and arrested. Back at the hotel Lenora and Quest discover that the professor is preparing to make a sea voyage to recover from the effects of Lord John's death—his brother.

Meanwhile Craig's mysterious friend assists him in escaping from the wine vault. He is put aboard a tug which is to carry him to the steamer Barton bound for Port Said. The tug is just leaving the dock as a steamer from America pushes her way into her slip. On the steamer is Laura, with plaster on her face and her arm in a sling. It is she who notices Craig on the tug. Once upon land she learns the destination of the Barton, and informs Quest who is soon upon the trail of Craig. The steamer left her moorings when Quest's party arrive at the dock, but a tug is chartered which soon overtakes the Barton. Quest tells the captain whom he is after, and it is not long before Quest and his party are aboard the Barton.

THE BLACK BOX (Episode No. 10—"The Ship of Horror"—Two Parts—Released week of May 10).—Craig cannot be found on the steamer Barton. Divided into three parties, with Sanford Quest, Professor Lord Ashleigh and the Scotland Yard men as leaders, the entire ship has been searched. The captain, angry that some of his men are apparently harboring a criminal, questions them himself. Satisfied that their search has been a careful one, he decides that Laura's eyes deceived her and that the man whom she thought was Craig was in truth someone else. But the girl is stubborn. The captain admires her decided ways and a merry rivalry arises between the sailor man and the Scotland Yarder. Since Craig is evidently not aboard and the ship touches no place until Port Said is reached, the party decides to make the best of its holiday. Quest and Lenora take miles of walks along the decks. The scientist immerses himself in his books, forgetting even to eat, while Laura finds her hands full with her two gallants.

On night at dinner Quest's party, with the exception of the professor, are seated at the captain's table. All but Quest have been served with bouillon. At that same moment a fussy old lady takes the seat next to the criminologist. At once she is cross because she has not instantly been served. Quest, amused, passes her his bouillon, which he has not yet tasted. Appeased, she sips it. A few seconds later there is a terrible, strangled cry of pain from the old woman and she falls back in her chair. After an examination the poor creature is pronounced dead by the ship's surgeon, the cause unknown. Quest has noticed that she has eaten nothing save the bouillon and decides to test it for possible poisons.

The professor leaves Quest, Lenora and the ship's doctor, who has been aiding in the tests, and returns presently with a diary. From this he reads them about the visit which he and Craig made among the Mongars, a wild nomad tribe of Africa, descendant from the Mongolians who conquered the entire country thousands of years before. One of their terrible secret poisons is Veedemzoo, which causes instant cramps and death in a few moments later, the only antidote being camphor. The presence of veedemzoo can be detected by the addition of sugar, after which the substance will turn a milky white. This secret information was given to Craig in gratitude because he saved the life of the little daughter of the chief. Meanwhile, on the deck above, the captain has been walking about, accompanied by Laura and the Scotland Yard. Suddenly the girl stops and points to Craig further away. They hurry to the place, but only the captain's steward, Brown, bumps into them as they hurry around the corner. The steward says that no one has been around except himself. Laura grumbles but suffers herself to be led down to Quest's cabin where she reports what she though she saw. Quest has lifted a hand to put some sugar into the bouillon. His hand sifts the sugar into the plate. Suddenly the clear brown liquid begins to thicken and turn white. This proves that Craig is aboard the ship, but a search fails to reveal him.

The ship docks at Port Said with still no trace of him. The steward, Brown, has made himself disliked for his sneaking ways and is discharged. He takes his belongings, a great roll of canvass, and departs. A few moments later the professor comes to Quest in great excitement. He has found a black box containing these words: "Foiled again. How easy it is. All of you together have not the cunning of a Mongar child. Don't try to follow me. The Hands." But Quest determines to do nothing else and his party will not leave him. Gathering camels, drivers and guides in Port Said, they all set out to follow Craig. That night, camped in the desert, Laura feels thirsty. A driver is drinking as she approaches the waterbag. She takes a single swallow, when the fellow shrieks in agony and falls to the ground, dead. At the same moment Laura feels a terrible cramp and calls out. Quest and the professor run to her, the former getting a bottle of camphor. A swallow of the biting liquid and the girl is herself again, for the water was poisoned with veedemzoo. The whole camp is agitated, but Quest soothes his party and they go to sleep. Soon after midnight there is a stealthy movement among the Arab guides and soon every camel is being led out of the camp and every Arab disappears, back toward Port Said.

BEAUTY.

LIFE'S STAIRCASE (May 11).—When Jack Bentley, a man of the world, meets Gladys Turner, they are mutually attracted. Following the announcement of their engagement, they each decide to destroy all tokens of past love affairs and banish the memories of previous attachments. Alone in their respective homes they recall to mind the events leading up to each individual case as they ponder over the memories of past pleasures until not one is left. Finally all memories of the past vanish and, as they are dressed for the wedding, are replaced by thoughts of the present and future. A vision of the happy day of their betrothal appears and as they finish dressing the thoughts of a happy future radiates their beings. It is part of the wedding ceremony, that they descend a long flight of stairs at the foot of which is stationed a minister and the assembled guests. As the bridal party descend the staircase both bride and groom are haunted by the spirits of forms of their past lovers and it is not until the minister pronounces them man and wife that their minds are cleared of the taunting illusions. Then follows a house boat honeymoon, and in the happiness of the present the memories of the past are forever forgotten.

AMERICAN.

THE ALTAR OF AMBITION (Two Parts—May 10).—Engrossed in his candidacy for governor, John Farden, neglects his wife and home ties. An important engagement prevents him from accompanying his wife to a musicale, but unwilling to spoil her pleasure, he suggests that she accept the escort of William Morris, a friend.

At the musicale Irene Farden's wife meets Richard Barry, her husband's political enemy. The morning papers announce the candidacy of John Farden against Richard Barry for the governorship, and Barry, fearing the strength of his opponent, plans to injure his chances by involving his wife in a scandal with William Morris, whose I. O. U.'s he holds for gambling debts. Morris, to save his reputation among his fellow-clubmen, reluctantly accepts the politician's plans.

At a lawn fete, Irene, unknowingly becomes involved in a flirtation with Morris and through Mrs Morris, who is also in the plot, the affair becomes common gossip among the guests. When John Farden hears the ugly rumors he refuses to believe them true, but later he discovers his wife out automobiling with Morris and finds a bouquet of roses in the library with that gentleman's card attached. He informs his wife that people are talking about her and begs that she refrain from further meetings with Morris. Irene, however, bent on enjoying her social engagements, continues her association with Morris, until one evening Morris plays his last card and tries to kiss her as he bids her goodnight. The scene is witnessed by Farden who denounces them both and refuses to believe his wife's explanation.

Ordered from her home, Irene goes to the home of a friend before the conspirators of a subsidized newspaper publishes an account of the scandal. Missing her mother's attentions, little Helen Farden becomes ill and the distracted father and the two nurses are unable to console her. Irene seeks the seclusion of the country, but is followed by Morris, who in an intoxicated condition, tries to force his attentions on her. In spite of all, Farden is elected governor and a month later as his child grows steadily worse, seeks Morris, hoping to find his wife's address. This information is withheld by Morris and the following day Morris goes to the country club hoping to meet Irene. As Morris orders a horse the hostler warns him not to ride while intoxicated, but Morris pays no heed and awkwardly rides away. As he approaches Irene's retreat the horse rears and he receives a fall. Servants carry him into the house and, summoning a doctor, he is pronounced unable to live. Before dying he seeks retribution and signs a confession, exonerating Irene and tells of the conspiracy to discredit her husband for political purposes. Armed with the confession, Irene returns to her husband and a happy reconciliation is affected at the bedside of their little child.

Cautiously she goes to the fated window and again smashes the glass and noiselessly returns to her room. Next morning the repairman is agreeably but honestly surprised. He is again called to fix the window which the professor tells him has been broken by burglars, but when the happy man confesses to breaking it on the previous night also, the lovers are quick to understand the reason for their acts. The professor, overhearing the conversation, recalls his order for a detective, changing it to a request for a minister.

She is in love with a young American, Conners, a reporter, but her old father doesn't like foreigners, and forbids her to have anything to do with him. Conners has met Bella while taking a pair of his shoes to be repaired. Luigi, a flashy Italian, has met her in the same way and is attracted by her, but she spurns him. He gets fresh and Conners whips him. Luigi plans to abduct her and when Bella delivers shoes to his place she is captured and held prisoner. He tells her he will keep her there until she agrees to marry him.

Fearful of being caught, he writes a note to a pal, telling him to meet him and they will take the girl to a certain spot in the suburbs and keep her there. In writing the note, he spills ink on it, and crumpling it up, throws it into the wastebasket. However, the crumpled-up note hits the edge of the basket, bounces off and lands in an old shoe lying on the floor beside the table. The girl is taken away and the landlady, having been told previously to send the shoes to the cobbler, finds them and takes them to Gapado. The latter finds the note, shows it to Conners, who is inquiring for Bella, and the latter goes to the rescue of Bella. That finished he finds Gapado more willing to accede to his suit for Bella's hand.

Genevieve overhears Gray telling Leila that he will come in that night at eleven o'clock through the drawing-room window, to take her away. The child, much frightened, tries to think of some way to save her mother. When John Sands comes home a little before ten, he locks the windows and goes to bed. Mrs. Sands unfastens the window in the drawing-room and returns to her room. When everything is still, Genevieve tiptoes down the stairs, locks the window again, and stations herself at the top of the stairs, to keep guard over her mother. She falls asleep. Leila comes cautiously from her room, ready to elope with Gray. She stumbles over the sleeping child, and Genevieve is thrown headlong down the stairs. Meanwhile, Gray arrives and forces open the window. Above, Sands and his tearful wife are trying to revive the unconscious child. Genevieve manages to tell her father that somebody is coming to take her mother away. He hears Gray at the window, and, rushing downstairs, he fires. THE SMUGGLER (May 12).—At the expiration of their prison term, Sampson and Wilson separate—Sampson determined to lead an honest life in future, Wilson to follow his old life. Some years later Sampson (now a prominent business man) is accompanying his daughter, Betty, home on the boat from an art school abroad.

On board is Wilson, a dangerous and much-wanted smuggler. Conners, a Secret Service man, is on his trail. On a previous trip Conners saved Betty (then traveling alone) from the unwelcome attentions of Wilson, and they are attracted to each other. Wilson sees Sampson, recognizes him, and on the threat of exposing his past, forces him to agree to carry in the diamonds he is now carrying concealed in a hollow cane. Sampson agrees and Wilson suggests that he sew them into the top of Betty's hat. Conners oversees the act. He plans to save Sampson and the girl and still perform his duty and get Wilson and the gems. He takes the gems and waits until the boat lands. He then hires a porter to upset Wilson, who drops his cane in his fall. Conners gets hold of it and quickly slips the gems into it and lays it back on the deck, from where Wilson picks it up and strolls off the boat, confident that his diamonds are safely off in Betty's hat. He is searched on the dock and, much to his surprise, the gems are found in his cane. Conners later marries Betty.

The picture closes as the old Indian is folding one end of his blanket about Mary and the child, and the other end about his son.

THANHOUSER.

THEIR ONE LOVE (May 2).—Jack, ever since childhood, has been the twins' hero. The years pass. Jack is as devoted as ever to the two beautiful young girls, but has given no sign that he cares for one more than for the other. The Civil War breaks out and Jack marches away. Each of the twins has come to love the young volunteer, but keeps her secret from her sister. One night Madeline wakes to see Marion standing by the window, looking at Jack's picture in the moonlight. She determines to give up Jack. Marion, however, has guessed Madeline's feelings for their "hero," and has made up her mind that she will not stand in the way of Madeline's happiness. The next day each of the twins writes to Jack. Marion's note tells him that Madeline is waiting for him. And Madeline's missive begs him to be careful of himself for Marion's sake. The letters never are posted. For word comes that day that Jack has been killed in battle.

MONSIEUR NICKOLA DUPREE (May 4).—Pierre, the artist, in his garret, sits reading two letters. One is from his old mother, begging him to come back home as she needs his loving care. The other is from Maurice, a millionaire chum, urging Pierre to come and live in luxury in return for teaching him how to paint. Pierre murmurs, "My poor old mother!" drops a tear on the words she has written—and promptly accepts his rich friend's offer. Then he turns. Standing in the doorway is a slender, dark-complexioned fellow, with a pointed beard. The stranger regards him with a smile. At the millionaire's home, both young men fall in love with Mariette, the beauty of the neighborhood. She prefers the artist because he is "so romantic." But when the millionaire proposes she says "yes." "For love in a cottage" she tells herself, "has positively gone out of date." The artist sorrowfully resigns himself to her choice. He feels no better, however, when he happens to see the black bearded apparition. Pierre escapes to Monte Carlo, where he loses all his money. M. Nick (for this is the name of the apparition) lends him funds. The artist sagely wins back his losings, pays his debts and departs. He has no intention of giving the devil first mortgage on his soul. Again in Paris, he finds that Mariette has jilted the millionaire, for, after all, she loves the poor artist. Pierre would do anything for his bride. So he hastens to M. Nick to borrow money for the wedding trip. Arriving at the home of his peculiar guardian spirit, he is not a whit dismayed by the growling of the thunder and the blinding flashes of lightning, which seem to warn him against this reprehensible step he is taking. And then he discovers that M. Nick does not hail from the lower regions, after all. He is really Pierre's long-lost uncle who intensely approves of his nephew because he will not consent to go and live upon the savings of his old mother, because he has left the gaming-table when he has won back his money, and particularly, because he was unselfish enough to give up the girl he loved. Everything considered, M. Nick decides to make Pierre his heir. And so, it is shown, that very often a man who looks like the devil is not a devil at all.

KAY-BEE.

THE KITE (Two Parts—May 7).—Benjamin Wheeler and his daughter, Marion, entertain at dinner Davis Watts, an eccentric capitalist, much interested in Wheeler's researches, and because of the warm weather they dine on the roof garden. Wheeler and his assistant, Hammond, have invented an electric kite, a device for detecting the approach of storms far in advance. When dinner is finished Watts seats himself in Mr. Wheeler's favorite chair. As Wheeler starts to play the violin, Watts falls forward in the chair, dead.

The following morning the police learn that Wheeler was considerably in debt to Watts and he is held on suspicion. The poor old man is all broken up when taken into custody by the police, and Marion calls to enlist the services of Norman Dunbar, a famous scientific detective, in her father's behalf. Dunbar feeling that the roof must furnish the key to the tragedy examines it thoroughly and finds in the chimney which connects with the laboratory a highly sensitized steel plate and concludes that Watts was killed by a current directed against the plate. A few days later Dunbar locates the kite, torn and frayed, lodged securely in the telephone wires in a street in the slums. He hires a small boy to climp the pole and get the kite for him and then detaches from it a copper wire and a steel needle. That afternoon he calls on Marion and in the laboratory his attention is attracted to a large dynamo. Upon questioning Hammond he discovers that the dynamo has voltage enough to kill about ten men.

Dunbar's suspicions are immediately directod to Hammond especially when he learns that Hammond wished to marry Marion but that her father would not hear of it. He feels convinced that Hammond intended to kill Wheeler, but that, because Watts took Wheeler's favorite chair, the shock was directed to him unintentionally. During Hammond's absence from the laboratory Dunbar sets a trap for him. He rigs up a large box kite, similar to the one made by Hammond and Wheeler. To this he attaches a coil of heavy wire. The other end of the wire is attached to the dynamo. He flies the kite from the laboratory window. He then awaits Hammond's return and when he comes in takes him up to the roof. At a signal from Dunbar, Marion throws the switch on the dynamo, and Dunbar points out to Hammond electricity flashed from a needle on the kite to the plate in the chimney passed completely through the body of Watts. Dunbar accuses Hammond of killing Watts when he intended to murder Wheeler. Hammond confronted with the evidence of his guilt breaks down and confesses.

HIS AFFIANCED WIFE (Two Parts—May 12). Vera Ashton's brother has led her into a life of crime, and forced her to assist him in his criminal operations. The night on which the story opens they have committed a robbery and stolen some valuable jewelry. The police are summoned and given a description of the stolen loot. Jennings, a detective, finds Jim Ashton's jimmy and on it Jim's thumb print. He takes it down to headquarters. Several days later Jim visits a pawnshop to pawn the loot. Vera takes advantage of his absence to pack up and get out. The pawnbroker recognizes the loot offered for pawn by Jim as the proceeds of a recent robbery. He secretly notifies the police and detains Jim until they arrive. Jim is arrested and taken up to the central station, where he denies the crime and offers the alibi that a friend gave him the jewelry to pawn for him. The police take Jim's thumb prints and compare them with these on his jimmy and find they match. Suspecting that Jim's sister is implicated in the robbery, the chief sends two detectives to place her under arrest.

She sees them coming and escapes in a series of exciting scenes across the roofs of nearby tenements and makes good her escape. Jim is convicted and sent to prison. Vera becomes a stenographer and secures employment with Dixon & Co., a wealthy contracting firm. Three years pass. Vera and Dixon are in love. She is a trusted employee. THE VICTIM (Majestic—Three Parts).—Frank Hastings, unjustly convicted of Darrell's crime, the robbing of Jason Ferguson, effects his escape from the penitentiary, and, under compulsion, Darrell's escape, too. Without revealing his past, he establishes himself in life and marries, but is driven from town by Darrell, who attempts to blackmail him. In New York he patents a time lock and becomes rich. When Darrell locates him again he submits to blackmail, but rebels when Darrell and another burglar call on him to open a safe with his time lock.

Finally he goes with them, opens the lock and then, when the thieves are inside the vault, slams the door shut and leaves them there to suffocate. It is Saturday night and they will not be found till Monday morning. His wife, Mary, notices his manner, however, and gets his secret out of him. She forgives him for his past, but insists he shall not be a murderer and persuades him to telephone the police. With the president of the bank and the police, Frank goes to the bank and opens the safe. Meanwhile, in the vault, Darrell has fought with his pal and killed him, and when the door is opened he is shot and killed in an attempt to escape. Dying, he confesses all the wrong he has done Frank.

THE ABSENTEE (Five Parts—Majestic).—Power, the Absentee, leaves his mills in charge of Might, who abuses his trust, lowers wages and steals the difference. His actions precipitate a strike. While the workers starve, Might squanders his ill-gotton gains on Extravagance and Vanity, his wife and daughter. All the while he writes to Power, who is spending his time at his club and in the city's fashionable life, that he is handling the strike properly.

Meanwhile the strikers riot. On the verge of starvation, two young girls go wrong, and Contentment, crazed by the death of his daughter, Happiness, turns into Evil and becomes the leader of the strikers. Justice, the office stenographer, as she sits down to write Power the truth about the situation, suddenly becomes blind so goes in person to see the Absentee. He refuses to listen to her and tells her that Might is right. When she has gone, he picks up the worn glove she left behind and is strangely moved by the pitiable wear and tear it so visibly exhibits. He resolves to investigate conditions himself.

When he reaches the factories he finds the militia have been called out. A fearful riot is in progress. Learning the truth about Might, Power has him properly dealt with and orders the withdrawal of the militia. When the soldiers have gone Justice points Power out as the cause of all the strikers' misery, and, despite Ambition's advice to them to be quiet, they attack the Absentee. After a terrific fight he is rescued and taken to the home of Justice and the two are reconciled. Ambition has taken Evil's place as leader of the strikers, and now Evil tries to shoot Power, but Justice steps between and intercepts the bullet. When she recovers, she and Power are married and as they walk out into the world again they are greeted with smiles by Ambition, Opportunity and Success.

AVARICE (Ideal—Two Parts—May 3).—The hard-working wife of the miner, Homer Jackson, dies just after her husband has struck a pay streak, leaving a child, Clara, to grow up motherless in the little mining town. Following this, Jackson is killed by his avaricious partner, James White, and the mouth of the only witness, a mine worker, is stopped by White's promises to give him gold. Ten years later, Dr. Grant, a rising young physician, visits the scene of the murder during a hunting trip. His interest is aroused and he determines to solve the mystery of the disappearance of Jackson and his daughter. He inserts a notice in the paper, stating that if the daughter of Homer Jackson will notify him she will learn something of interest to her. In the meantime White, who has raised Clara in a different town since her father's death, is called back to the mine by the news that a new strike has been made. The mystery is solved at last by the young doctor, a confession is forced from Whites' lips and Clara, now a wealthy young woman, becomes the bride of the amateur detective.

THE TRUNK MYSTERY (Superba—May 4).—Fred, feeling in a devilish mood, begins to shoot. A bullet goes through the wall into the next room where Tom, who is drunk, has just succeeded in spilling red ink over his face. Fred, running in and seeing the ink, thinks it is blood, hits Tom over the head and puts him in the trunk, then goes out. Tillie, the maid comes in and is in turn hit over the head by Tom, who has succeeded in getting out of the trunk. There follows a series of comic scenes in which every one connected with the story succeeds in spending a portion of time in the trunk. All ends happily in the end, and the company joins in a drink in Tom's sitting room sitting on the trunk which has been returned after a trip to the forest, to its proper place.

THE SHOP NUN (Empress—Two Parts—May 5).—Ruth Eaton, the shop nun, is beloved by all the employees of the William Morgan Co., and when the firm is sold out to Ellis Bartwell, it is with the understanding that Ruth shall be retained. She uses her influence in keeping the other employees from losing their positions, too, and in return is invited by Madge, one of the stenographers, to a party which Ruth finds too gay, and goes home. Ruth is scorned by her new employer's fiancee, who comes to the office to see Bartwell. When she accidentally learns that the engagement between the head of the firm and the girl has been broken, she shows her sympathetic understanding by giving Bartwell a motto which she had had for years on her desk—"The Great and Best Things of Life Are Free for the Taking." Then, troubled at thinking she has overstepped her position, she hurries to the street, and does not return to the office next day. Madge is sent for her. On her return Bartwell realizes what a splendid woman Ruth is, gives the other employees a half holiday and tells her that he is going to take the greatest and best thing in the world—herself.

LOUISA'S BATTLE WITH CUPID (Luna—May 6).—As usual when an old maid sister knows that if she marries before her young and attractive sister does she will get the greater share of her father's fortune, consequently Louisa devotes her energies to getting a man. She takes her sister, Rose, to a ranch in the West, where her plot to marry the book agent before Rose has an opportunity to even see the man is thwarted by the chance meeting of Rose and Pete Poirier. This case of love at first sight results in a race between Rose and her lover and Louisa and the book agent to the house of the parson. The young couple win, much to the disappointment of Louisa and the agent. The gambling blood of the agent is challenged by Pete, and he marries Louisa on the chance that the money she does possess will bring him more happiness than life without it.

THE OTHER GIRL (Premier—Two Parts—May 7).—Ransacking through his father's strong box, Fred finds a deed to a mining claim in Arizona. On receiving a letter from Lillian breaking off their engagement, Fred leaves for the West. Having landed there, he incites the enmity of three unscrupulous men—Brady, a gambler, who determines to try to get Fred's claim away from him; Blevins the dance hall boss, who hates him because he succeeds in persuading Madge, the dance hall girl, who reminds him of Lillian, to leave her hard life, and Jose, a half breed. In the meantime, Lillian finds that she loves Fred, and leaves for the West, followed by her mother. Fred's life is saved by Madge, who is stabbed by a knife thrust intended for him, just before Lillian, who, through her resemblance to Madge, is almost forced into a mock wedding with Blevins, and her mother arrive on the scene. It is disclosed that Lillian and the little dead dancing girl, Madge, are sisters, and that Lillian's mother had been the wife of a miner, who lost his mind and that Madge had been stolen by a band of Indians when she was a small child. The picture closes, leaving to the onlooker a knowledge that all will end hapily for Lillian and Fred.

TOLD IN THE ROCKIES (Lariat—Two Parts—May 8).—When the son of Sir Gilbert Lonsdale disappears, with his infant daughter in the heart of the Rockies, an old trapper finds the child and takes her to his cabin, where she is reared and cared for by his daughter, who is being courted by a young mountaineer. In after years the young man turns his affections to the now grown daughter of the titled Englishman. The father of the child, who has lost his reason, and is known as the wildman of the hills, is at last discovered by his father. The identity of the daughter is proven and father and girl are taken back to England, where the insane man is cured of his illness, and the beautiful young woman marries a wealthy man she loves. Happiness and contentment settles down upon the daughter of the trapper and her mountain lover.

CAN LOVE GROWN COLD BE REVIVED (Cameo—May 9).—A young married couple, eager for a canine pet, and their married butler and maid with an infant hidden in their dark past, furnish the entangling meshes which engulf the genial Uncle Dudley, before he manages to extricate himself. Uncle Dudley, as the doctor, becomes the chief fix-it-all, because of his marvelous invention of the "love-pill," which capsule is able to turn the most bitter fury into the most desperate love and desire to kiss. Dudley's remedy, however, goes amiss, and much to the dismay of his wife, his lips succeed in becoming the object of his stenographer, his wife's maid, his housemaid, his corpulent cook and last, but not least, his pet bull-dog. The irate wife saves him from their osculations and is, in turn placated through the enforced swallowing of the eminent physician's "love-pill."

WHO PAYS? THE LOVE LIAR (Episode No. 4).—Born with the proverbial silver spoon in her mouth—reared in the even more proverbial lap of luxury, the lady didn't know what it meant to make ends meet. Her ends had always luxuriously overlapped. But the time came when the lady had to choose between dread poverty and a wedding ceremony with a rich invalid whose only knowledge of youth was a distant memory. . . . She was led to the altar where she mouthed "'till death do us part" farce, and went to live out her lie with a man whose wealth was the only thing about him she loved. To live with a man she didn't love would, under ordinary circumstances, have been difficult enough—it was the natural aversion of Youth for Age; but when, added to this, she found she had fallen desperately in love with her husband's young medical attendant, her life perforce became a torturous labyrinth of lies and fears of apprehension. It is at this point that "The Love Liar" makes its greatest appeal to your insistent demand for unflinching realism in the place of the usual lollypop romanticism.

THE NEW EXPLOITS OF ELAINE (Episode No. 5—"The Saving Circles"—Two Parts).—A new ally of Wu Fang, the serpent, is an aviator in his plane circling ominously above Craig Kennedy's house. Balanced in the reckless flyer's palm is a bomb of Trodite, the new super-force in explosives. The bird-man looks for a painted circle as the prearranged target for his agent of destruction. He sees it. Straight to the mark goes the infernal death dealer. A startling white flash—a million splinters—an unrecognizable body, and far off on the horizon the fast fading outline of the modern bird of prey. Tense, expectant, shocked—but ultimately triumphant, the detective who harnesses Science in his pursuit of Crime stands watching at the window of his laboratory. He knew about the aeroplane; he knew that the Government had been robbed of the ultra powerful Trodite; he knew of the large white circle that was to mark his house as the object of attack. He knew also that directly across the court one of Wu Fang's henchmen was spying upon him. That's why, in the dead of night, he and his assistant Jameson ascended to the roof where they scrubbed out the fateful circle. That's why they ever so quietly ascended to the roof of the house directly across the court and painted thereon a large white circle the counterpart of the one recently scrubbed off, and that's why, when the detonation came, the fragments of what was once a Chinaman mixed with the fragments of what was once a house—and left Craig Kennedy shaken, but sound.

Did you ever see an aeroplane high in the heavens get hit with a steel jacketed shell projected from an armored automobile? Did you ever see a death duel between a terror of the skies and a gun constructed especially to bring it down? Here you see the aeroplane get hit, shiver as though in startled hesitation, make a final desperate struggle to keep afloat, and finally descend in circles, fluttering helpless, like a wounded bird, to the ground. These are some of the awe-inspiring incidents to be seen in this episode.

UNFOUNDED JEALOUSY (Two Parts—May 3).—Phyllis Grey loves her husband fervently, and is in turn idolized by him. Her highly sensitive nature is also a highly suspicious one, tortured by her love to question and doubt upon the merest shadow of provocation. When her sister writes and announces her intention to visit them, Phyllis becomes immediately uneasy. This uneasiness is kept in check only by the greatest exercise of her will, and becomes uncontrollable when, later, she sees her sister and her husband in secret and earnest conversation. In reality, this conversation concerns a difficulty her husband is in, and out of which her sister is trying to help him. Goaded to jealous rage at what she fancies to be her husband's infidelity and her sister's disloyalty, she decides on a desperate measure to rid her home of her imagined rival. Stealing out to the corral, she cuts the check line of a fiery mount her sister usually rides, cuts it so that the first strain will sever it and leave the rider helpless. Her jealousy quickly turns to concern when she sees hed own daughter set up beside her sister on the restless horse. Before she can recover from the shock they have galloped off. Quickly she runs to her husband, and tells him what her frightful jealousy has led her to do. On foot, and hopelessly, they follow horse and riders. Breathlessly they come to the edge of a deep ravine, where they find their daughter miraculously saved, but know that the sister has vanished headlong over the cliff with the madly galloping horse. Almost dead she is picked up and carried home, where for weeks she lies unconscious before starting to convalesce. But Phyllis has learned well her lesson, and faithfully promises herself never again to allow her unfounded jealousy to overbalance her reason.

COL. HEEZA LIAR SIGNS THE PLEDGE (Animated Cartoon Comedy By J. R. Bray—May 3).—When the redoubtable Colonel, returning home, sees a footpad collecting his toll from an unfortunate "Johnnie" who fell beneath the impact of a blackjack, he quickly goes to the rescue. The befriended person is so grateful to the Colonel that he lets the Colonel drink as much as he likes, with the result that the Colonel gets somewhat stewed. The Colonel is certainly in very good spirits and has very good spirits in him, which accounts for the extraordinary occurrences which happen on the way to his downy (?) couch. The world seems to go spinning around as he makes his uncertain way through the streets. How he finally makes his entrance into his house is as funny as it is unusual.

MAY BLOSSOM (Famous Players—April 15).—May Blossom loves Richard Ashcroft, a Southern officer, and accepts his proposal of marriage immediately after receiving one from her father's choice, a suitor named Steve Harland, who loves her madly. She sorrowfully tells him she prefers Richard, nearly breaking Steve's heart. That night, without a chance to bid May good-bye, Richard is arrested by officers from the Northern army, who have suspected from his frequent trips across the river that he is a spy. Richard is torn away by his captors, exacting a promise from Steve, who witnessed his arrest, to tell May the circumstances, that she must be faithful, and that he will return some day, if he lives. Steve yields to temptation and only tells May Richard has fled, never to return. May believes Richard false, tries to shut him out of her heart, and finally succumbs to Steve's importunities and marries him. Steve and May are married a year, and a little girl comes to them, who is adored by both. Steve is tortured constantly by the remembrance of his perfidy to Richard, who has not been heard of since his arrest, and is thought by all to be dead. Richard returns to claim his promised wife, having finally escaped, and finding her married to Steve, tells her the story of the arrest, and Steve's oath to him. May calls Steve, who mutely confronts the man he wronged, till May is about to be torn from him, when, like an angered lion, he protects his own. Richard is sent away by May, and Steve goes to war, returning finally to be forgiven.

NIOBE (Famous Players—Five Parts).—Niobe was the daughter of Tautolus, and the wife of Amphion, King of Thebes. Her pride in her children provoked Apollo, who slew them. Whereupon Niobe was so overcome with grief that she turned into a stone statue, which gushed fountains of tears. The statue, coming down through the ages, is bought by Tompkins, an art enthusiast, who has it insured by the company of which Peter Amos Dunn is president, who takes the statue to his own home for safekeeping. Electricians, wiring the house, leave live wires at the feet of the statue, and suddenly the beautiful Niobe steps from her pedestal and confronts the startled Dunn. He is at a loss to explain the presence of the goddess to his family. But he remembers that a governess, who has sent her trunks in advance, is expected in a day or two, and he hits upon the scheme of dressing up Niobe as the governess and introducing her to his wife and daughters as such. How the comedy ends is best learned from a view of the picture.

THE CAPTIVE (Jesse L. Lasky).—At the opening of the picture a young peasant of Montenegro, Marko Martinovitch, living on the border between Montenegro and Turkey, is supporting his sister and little crippled brother on a tiny farm with a poor but comfortable cabin. The call to arms comes, and he leaves the fields to take up his weapons of war. In contrast to this scene is shown a dinner at the castle belonging to Mahmud Hassan, a great Turkish Bey, who is also leaving for the front to fight for his country. These two introductory scenes are followed by a view of the Battle of Lule Burgess, during which the Montenegran peasant is slain and the Turkish noble is taken prisoner of war. For a time Mahmud is in prison, but he is later taken to a Montenegrin village with other captives, who are to be allotted to the bereaved women of the district as servants to do the work of the slain or absent men.

Mahmud is allotted to Sonya, the sister of the peasant Martinovitch, and she leads him to her cabin, literally driving him, whip in hand. Sonya, partly as revenge for the death of her brother, decides to treat Mahmud in the most humiliating manner possible, taking the horse out of the plough and forcing him to drag it himself and also compelling him to do unaccustomed menial tasks of cooking and washing. Mahmud, who has given his parole to Sonya, accepts the bitter situation with a touch of humorous restraint. His only friend is the little crippled brother, who has immediately taken a fancy to him. In the end Mahmud revolts and Sonya finds that her captive is really the master. Little by little Sonya finds herself coming to regard the captive in a more friendly light, for his courtesy, strength and courage are vast forces of attraction. They do not confess the fact, they both come to realize the growth of a mutual sentiment.

When affairs have reached this stage a band of Turkish soldiers capture the nearby village, get drunk in the tavern and go foraging. The officer takes a fancy to Sonya, drags her into the house and tries to kiss her. Mahmud rushes to the rescue, and the Turkish officer, at first delighted to see him, says that he will set him free. However, when the officer indicates that he wants Sonya the two men immediatly clash. Mahmud throws the officer out of the house which he then barricades, intending to fight a forlorn hope. The Montenegran reinforcements fortunately arrive in time to prevent a catastrophe of a serious nature, but Mahmud is wounded by a shot fired by the officer whom he has defied.

Mahmud, regretting that he cannot marry Sonya because of their different stations in life, now returns to his Turkish castle, but is greeted on his arrival by a soldier from the Sultan who hands him a proclamation confiscating his lands and its title for resisting his superior officer. Hero and heroine, now equally destitute, finally are brought together.

THE WOMAN (Lasky-Belasco—5 parts).—The story relates the attempt of a group of machine politicians at Washington to ruin Matthew Standish, an insurgent who has made himself so strong with the people that he is in a position to defeat the Mullin's bill, fostered by a corrupt ring in Washington, in favor of certain railroads. The leaders of this ring are Jim Blake, who is the boss of the party machine, and his son-in-law, Mark Robertson. Standish is being hailed throughout the country as the exponent of morals and virtue, and Blake realizes that the only way to defeat him is to find some blot on his record in the past. He puts a detective to work, who, by bribing Standish's former secretary, finds out that some years ago Standish became involved with a young woman of good family, and that for some reason he did not marry her. Blake realizes that skillfully handled, this story could be made to ruin Standish's career; but without the name of the woman it will look like a campaign lie. So the entire machine bends its energy to discovering the identity of the woman in order to prove the story. To accomplish this, they lay a trap, which they think, will make Standish try to warn the woman by telephone. He is deceived and does telephone the woman to be on her guard, calling the number, Plaza 1001. Wanda Kelly, telephone girl at the Keswick, has been told of the plan by Blake, who believes that she can be bribed to give him the telephone number.

After Standish telephones, Robertson, Blake's son-in-law, comes in to 'phone his home in New York, calling the same number that Standish has just called. Wanda, the operator, sees that the woman in the case is really Blake's daughter and Robertson's wife, and besides refusing to give the number, destroys her record sheet. Mrs. Robertson arrives from New York and is driven to desperation when Standish informs her that, though he has tried to protect her, he shall have to give her name to Blake and Robertson if they continue striving to ruin him by this story.

The subsequent events leading to the conclusion of the drama and the defeat of the offensive Mullins bill in Congress are stirring in the extreme. Once again the telephone girl interferes in the plot by disconnecting the wires when the "ring" politicians, driven to their last ditch, are trying to telephone a newspaper to release the story even without the name of the woman. She keeps her courage after this, even when threatened with arrest and criminal prosecution. It is the woman herself who finally comes to the rescue and refuses to see the little telephone girl made to suffer further on her behalf. This terrible revelation makes Blake and Robertson see what a veritable little heroine she has been and even leads to the happy consummation of a romance between the telephone operator and Jim Blake's son.

HELP WANTED (Morsco-Bosworth 5 parts).—Mrs. Helen Barker, who has a son, Jack, is married to Jerrold Scott. When Jack finishes college he returns home and is made a partner of his stepfather in the firm of Scott & Son. At Scott's request he adopts his step-father's name. The reception room at Scott & Son's is full of girls waiting in answer to an advertisement for a stenographer. One pretty girl opening the wrong door, enters the room where Jack is waiting for his father. She and Jack get into conversation and she tells him of her troubles in finding a position; he tells her that it is his first day in business. Scott, entering, greets his son and shows him the sign on the door including him in the firm. Jack tells him that the girl is Gertie Meyer, who is looking for a position and who came to the wrong door. She is sent to the waiting room and Jack is taken to the auditing department where he is to get his first training.

The bookkeeper, Crane, who has been with the firm twenty years, and knows Scott's requirements for a secretary, selects those who are competent but lacking in physical charms, and sends them in for interview. One of these is Miss Wiggins, but she is too clever and is sent out to interview Crane. He retains her for some extra work on his own account. Scott, coming to the door, selects Gertie and dismisses the others. He asks her many personal questions, but nothing about her efficiency, and accepts her at a higher salary than she asked of him. Gertie, delighted with her position, begs her mother to leave the laundry where she is working, and brings her two small brothers home from the orphan asylum. All goes well the first week, except that with the first dictation Gertie makes a hopeless failure of the letters, and when she cries over her failure, Scott, in a fatherly way, puts his arms around her, and tells her that it was a difficult letter, and he will straighten it out. When he goes out, and while Gertie is making the corrections, Miss Wiggins slips into the private office and warns Gertie about Scott, tells her just what to expect, and asks her if he has taken her to luncheon yet. Gertie resents this and warmly defends her benefactor.

When Scott returns and learns that Gertie has no money to pay for her luncheon, he persuades her to go to a restaurant and lunch with him. She dissents, but finally goes. She is awed by the fashionable people, the music, and the odd names on the menu. She refuses to have a cocktail, but Scott drinks. Seeing Paul Montgomery, his daughter's fiance, in the restaurant, he feigns sudden illness to avoid speaking to him, gives Gertie a ten dollar bill and tells her he must rush off to meet an engagement and for her to pay for the meal. By the end of the first month at her position, Gertie has often dined with her employer, but her sense of propriety never ceases to be outraged by his amorous demonstrations. In the meantime, Jack Scott, who has had a growing interest in her since the morning she applied for the position, declares his love for her, and asks her to marry him. In her perplexity, Gertie goes to the Y. W. C. A. to call upon Miss Wiggins, who tells her to marry Jack if he really loves her, and receive no more attentions from the father. Gertie resolves to do this, even though she lose her position.

The next day Scott asks Gertie to remain at the office in the evening, to do some work for him. Jack, not seeing Gertie leave the office, secretly waits for her. When the other employees are gone, Scott locks the door, seizes Gertie in his arms, and declares his love for her. In the struggle which follows, Gertie screams for help. Jack smashes through the door and defends the girl. Scott does not know of their love, and orders Jack out. In the excitement Gertie slips out. Jack, not knowing her address, hires detectives to locate her. Gertie, arriving home, is denounced by her mother for bringing the family to poverty again, and threatens to go to Scott's house herself and take a lawyer with her. Gertie goes out to a telephone and calls Jack, and at his request meets him at his home. Together they wait for his mother and sister, but when they come they do not receive Gertie with open arms. Scott and his lawyer, Stuart,, are in the library discussing the affair, when the butler gives away the fact that Jack and his fiancee are in the house with Mrs. Scott. Mrs. Meyers, enraged that detectives should be sent to her house, and fearing that the Scott millions have led away her little girl, bursts in and denounces Scott in her broken German-English. Stuart is authorized to provide financial aid for the Meyer's family, and when Scott learns that Jack has not told the whole story to Mrs. Scott, he forgives everything, thanks his lucky stars that his wife does not know his perfidy, and accepts the situation in a truly happy way.

BEULAH (Balboa—Six Parts).—Dr. Guy Hartwell, a young and wealthy Louisiana physician, was a man of strange personality. Five years previous to the opening of the story he married and bestowed sincere love upon his wife. In return she basely played him false and shortly afterward died. From that moment he was a changed man. Embittered against the world, mankind and even distrusting God, the silent and melancholy man lived on. With the doctor lived his widowed sister and her daughter, whom every one considered as the heir of the physician's wealth. In the same city lived Beulah Benton, who was sent from the orphan asylum out into the world to earn her living as a servant girl, while her little sister Lillian found a home as the foster daughter of a rich lady.

At the orphanage Beulah learned to love Eugene, another inmate, but he, too, was adopted by a wealthy family and sent abroad to be educated. He promised upon his return to make Beulah his wife. Beulah yearned to see her sister, but Lillian's foster parents forbade the two to meef. This affected Beulah deeply, but the crushing blow was about to descend. Lillian fell ill, and in spite of every effort of Dr. Hartwell the younger sister died. Beulah, seeing the crepe on the door, forced herself in and for the first time met the doctor. The kindness of his nature was reawakened by the grief-stricken girl, and he took her to his home, attended her through a serious illness, then placed her in school.

But Beulah found her new surroundings far from pleasant. While the doctor as yet refused to trust any woman, he treated her with marked respect and consideration, but his sister fearing that the adopted girl would become the heir instead of her own daughter, lost no opportunity to humiliate Beulah. It was more than she could bear, and at last the girl sadly left the doctor's house and returned to the orphanage; but the doctor, however, brought her home again and provided other quarters for his sister and her daughter, both of whom were wholly dependent upon him for support.

The years passed and Beulah's lover, Eugene, returned from Europe, a dissipated wretch, his love for the orphan girl forgotten and his hand pledged to the frivolous niece of Dr. Hartwell's false wife. The physician warned the foolish youth to give her up, pleading with him to remain true to his promise to Beulah, but without avail. It was now that Hartwell realized that he himself loved her and declared his affection. Beulah expressed her great gratitude, but still grieving over her false lover, told him that she could not return his affections. Hartwell went North and Beulah became a school teacher.

An epidemic broke out and people were perishing by the score. Doctor Hartwell returned to the stricken city. The doctor and Beulah met and side by side they fought the ravages of the disease. Clara Saunders, a friend of Beulah's fell in love with Hartwell, but becomes a victim of the plague, and with her departing breath joined the hands of the two, and bade them be happy. Through comradeship with Beulah, the doctor's faith in God and Man was restored, and his life made still brighter by her voluntary confession of her love for him. Their marriage followed, and Beulah and her husband fearlessly faced the future.

GRAUSTARK (Essanay—Six Parts—April 26).—Grenfall Lorry, a wealthy young American, meets a charming girl on an express train en route to Washington, and aids her to overtake the train by a thrilling coach ride through the mountains, when they are left behind at a small mining town. Lorry learns her name is Guggenslocker. He follows her to Edelweiss, in Graustark, her home. On the way he meets an old college friend, Barry Anguish, and they make the journey together. Lorry meets Miss Guggenslocker on the street and obtains a faint smile of recognition.

That night he and Anguish overhear a plot to abduct the Princess Yetive. Lorry and Anglish approach the castle by stealth, and Lorry is amazed to find Miss Guggenslocker is Her Royal Highness, Princess Yetive of Graustark. He saves her from the ruffians. Lorry learns that Yetive faces a serious crisis. Two suitors clamor for her hand, Prince Lorenz of Asphain, and Gabriel, Prince of Dawsbergen. Graustark must pay an enormous war indemnity to Asphain. Marriage to Lorenz grants Yetive an extension of time to meet the payment. Failure to do so means the signing away of almost her entire principality. Lorry's great love for the girl determines him to save her. He and Anguish are certain that Prince Gabriel was the man who plotted to abduct Yetive. Because of his rank, they dare not accuse him.

In despair Yetive promises to wed Lorenz. That night the prince, intoxicated, insults Yetive and is knocked down by Lorry. A duel is arranged but Lorenz is found slain in his bed. Lorry is accused of the murder and is imprisoned. Yetive aids him to escape. Prince Bolaroz, father of the slain prince, arrives in Edelweiss, and offers Yetive extension of time for paying the debt if Lorry is captured and executed. The persistent Gabriel presses his offer of marriage. Yetive orders him from the castle. That night Lorry escapes from the montstery, gains entrance to the castle and surprises Yetive in her boudoir. He swears he will give himself up for execution, and save her kingdom.

Next morning, in the throne room, Gabriel accuses Yetive of concealing Lorry, but is frustrated by Lorry bursting in and offering his life for the Princess. Yetive declares her love for Lorry and begs Bolaroz for mercy. Bolaroz angrily refuses and demands Lorry's death. Anguish suddenly confronts Gabriel and accuses him of Lorenz's murder. Gabriel confesses. Bolaroz then makes an alliance with Graustark. Lorry weds the princess and is crowned.

THE COMMUTERS (Five Parts).—Larry Brice and his friend Rolliston are suburbanites. Rolliston invites Larry to stay down-town with him and take in the cabarets which Larry, with a pang of misgiving, consents to do, 'phoning home the usual excuse about business.

The two friends "do" the various roadhouses, acquiring liquid refreshments and sundry joys en route, winding up finally in a Long Island Palace of Joy. When the confetti-throwing stage is reached, Larry, with splendid aim, bounces a ball of serpentine off the bald head of excitable "Sammy," director of the Italian orchestra. sitive musician follows the devious route of the paper missile, arriving at the table of the two friends where reconciliation, wine and spaghetti supplants manslaughter. Larry 'phones his wife, Hetty, that business continues to press, forgetting, however, to shut out the strains of music from the telephone booth. She goes to bed disgusted and some hours later hears her husband arrive with "Sammy" in tow, insisting that the latter take the guest's bedroom. Then Larry promptly falls asleep, awakes in time for the 7.46 and hurries to the office without telling Hetty of his new-found acquaintance.

Meanwhile, Carrie, the maid, dirty, slangy, lazy and incompetent, finds the bed disordered and, lifting the covers, screams at the apparition of the sleeping Sammy. Hetty guesses the truth. Sammy forthwith takes his departure, but gets only to the street, where the small boys pelt him unmercifully. Sammy returns and refuses to budge until a suit of clothes is provided. And Hetty, with a wife's freedom, expresses herself clearly to Larry over the telephone, causing that gentleman to rush out. C. O. D. a suit of street clothes for Sammy. In the interim, the suffragette club meets at the Brice home. And then things happen rapidly. The carrier arrives with the clothes; the maid refuses to accept the C. O. D.; Sammy frantically pursues him, beats him up, takes the clothes and is in the act of stealing softly into the house when the suffragettes discover him. He is mauled by four husky women, the constable is called and Hetty again rushes to the rescue, explaining to her friends that Sammy is no burglar. With suggestively-raised eyebrows, the suffragettes march home, making divers and sundry remarks concerning Hetty's conduct. While that unfortunate young woman is carried half fainting to her room, the constable arrives and arrests Sammy.

From this plight, Larry, who has just arrived home, saves him. Sammy insists upon staying for supper and Hetty announces the expected arrival of her mother. This causes Larry to hurry Sammy out of the house. They meet Rolliston and in his big racer make another night of it among the roadhouses. In the meantime little Mrs. Rolliston visits Hetty with the information that her husband is also missing, and suggests that Hetty take vengeance. To this end Mrs. Rolliston addresses a love note to Hetty, purporting to come from "Jack," and while concocting their plot are interrupted by the arrival of Larry and Sammy.

Hetty slips into a clothes closet, while Mrs. Rolliston slips out of the door. The latter promptly tells her husband, who 'phones Larry of the proposed joke, but forgets to tell him of the letter. When Larry meets Hetty in the dining room, she drops the fake note and he, in a sudden fit of jealousy, creates a family row. Up stairs Sammy has found a pair of Larry's pajamas and goes into the guest's room where the apparition of mother-in-law in bed causes him to flee softly to the nearest room, which chances to be Larry's. That young man meanwhile has gone to Rolliston for an explanation of the note. Hetty, anxious to make up, goes to Larry's room, put her arms around him, and to her horror discovers—Sammy! A few minutes later when Larry is returning from Rolliston's, he is made suddenly aware of a terrific racket from the upper bedrooms of his home. Fearing for his wife he rushes up the steps, only to find that Sammy had gotten into mother-in-law's room and had been dealt with in the approved fashion. This settles Sammy, who hurries back to his beloved Broadway, swearing that the commuter's life is no life for him.

The girl, whose name is Elaine, has two lovers, for one of whom, John Butler, she forms a sincere attachment. Her stepmother goes to see her dance, and the hunchback, still enraged at her, murders the woman.

The hunchback goes mad and is killed by falling from a cliff. Butler, Elaine's lover, is accused of killing him, but Elaine clears him of the charge by proving the hunchback was the murderer of her stepmother. Elaine and Butler find that their mutual loves will make them happy in marriage.

WHEN IT STRIKES HOME (Harris—Five Parts—May 17).—Dick Hartley hastily marries a dancing girl. As he is under age, his father, a wealthy man, objects to the marriage and succeeds in having it annulled. He sends the boy to South Africa. A son is born to the divorced girl. When Dick Hartley returns from South America, he works hard in his father's office and in due time, forgetting his divorced wife, marries another girl. The marriage is happy but childless. It chances that the dancing girl's little boy is adopted by young Mr. and Mrs. Hartley in ignorance of his origin.

Twenty years pass. The boy becomes a successful doctor working in a New York hospital. The elder Hartley, father of Dick, meets with an accident and is taken to the hospital for treatment. In the hospital, the dancing girl of twenty-one years before, is now placed as Sister Ursula, vowed to a life of ministration to the afflicted. Old Hartley recognizes the former lancing girl in Sister Ursula, and she also recognizes her own son in the young Dr. Hartley. But the ex-dancer voluntarily remains in the hospital, and thus the younger Hartley and his wife do not have their happiness menaced.

THE BULLDOGS OF THE TRAIL (Interstate Feature—Four Parts).—John Graham and his daughter Peggy arrive in Blackfoot, Canada, to pay a visit to Inspector Creighton of the Mounted Police. About the same time a young lieutenant of the corps arrives to assist Inspector Creighton in running down a notorious outlaw.

McLloyd and Peggy while riding through the woods near the post one day, discover the dead body of Graham hidden under a pile of underbrush. McLloyd a few minutes before has fired at a bird near this same pile of brush which makes Peggy think that her father was killed by the policeman's bullet. McLoyd is thunderstruck when the girl accuses him of murder and knowing the direction in which he fired that his bullet could not possibly have caused the death of Graham, he starts on an investigation.

The strange action of Inspector Creighton causes McLoyd to center his investigation in his direction, until finally after the death of his superior officer McLoyd clears up the mystery and rescues Peggy from almost certain death at the hands of a Hindoo secret society named "The Shinto" which was responsible for the death of Graham and Creighton.

Make Your Theatre the Coolest Place in Town

Put G-E Six blade oscillating fans in your theatre—as they swing from side to side they search out the stuffy corners and keep the air in motion—fresh and cool. They run silently, without rustle, rattle or vibration—there is no distraction from the full enjoyment of the show.

A cool place inside is a good investment—which is realized in the box office at the end of the day. Insist on the

Six Blade Oscillating Fan

See that the G-E trade mark is on the center. Then you will be sure of getting the fan that is built especially for moving picture theatres; you can be sure also of your fans lasting season after season without the slightest trouble or attention beyond oiling once a year.

Those are the kind of fans to get—that will be just as good five or six years hence as they are today. Every G-E Fan is like that, because it has G-E quality and over twenty-five years' experience and knowledge in fan building behind it.

Write to us today; give dimensions, etc., of your theatre—our fan engineers will be glad to lay out your plan for "The Coolest Place in Town."

MINA
FILMS

The present day craze for comedy pictures has created a wonderful money-making opportunity for exhibitors, the very limit of which may be realized only by the use of comedies that are always good. One inferior comedy causes a greater set-back to a theatre's business than two genuinely funny films can overcome.

In MinA Films a heart-breaking standard of merit has been set by the producers. This standard is maintained week after week—there is no let down in quality. Though only a few months old MinA one-reel comedies have achieved a remarkable vogue—an accomplishment of supreme merit alone. Exhibitors will be taking advantage of opportunity by ordering MinA Films from the nearest licensed exchange. Released every Thursday on the

To aid those who wish to guard against the formation of bad writing habits, or who wish to estimate their progress, I offer the following service:

Script Criticism For a fee of two dollars for each reel, I will read your manuscript and write a personal letter, pointing out the faults of plotting, technical development, manuscript preparation, etc. Sometimes I can help you to make the script salable, but I do not guarantee a sale. I do not revise manuscript; I do not typewrite it, nor do I offer it for sale. I simply write you a letter that tells you what the trouble is.

Plot Estimates If your stories do not sell and you want to know why, send me five synopses and one full script. I will criticise the script and tell you whether it is your plot or your development that is wrong. The fee for this service is $5 for the five synopses and additional plot. Synopses must not run more than 300 words each. Send a synopsis of your undeveloped plot and fee of one dollar and you will be advised as to whether it will pay you to develop the same.

Please Note My fees do not include envelopes or return postage. Send prepaid and self addressed return envelope and remit in New York exchange; not local checks. I reserve the right to return unread (with fee) any story or plot that does not warrant treatment. All scripts must be typewritten.

Are all these papers wrong?

Last week the ENTIRE MOTION PICTURE PRESS went on record regarding THANHOUSER and FALSTAFF films. The accredited representatives of ALL the trade and theatrical journals faced you—you saw their photographs in one group, just as they looked when they passed judgment. They ALL saw the new productions of Edwin Thanhouser and they ALL said "THANHOUSER HAS MADE GOOD!" Mind you—it wasn't only one, or two, or three papers, but ALL OF THEM—ten critics spoke.

See the value of their work? They did it for YOU! You are now dead certain—pop sure—absolutely positive that Thanhouser and Falstaff are CERTAIN, SURE, POSITIVE quality brands.

And honestly—they will hold your enthusiasm ANY week. You know—CONSISTENT QUALITY!

How to Make Money
by Lewis J. Selznick

No. 16

This series of articles is planned to make money for you—to show you why my ideas have succeeded—and why they will succeed for you if you will weigh each one carefully. Some of them will sound egotistical. I want them to—it's the only way I can drive home my arguments.

Here are a few excerpts from the many letters that come to us continually. They tell their own story of how wide awake exhibitors are MAKING MONEY by using World Film program.

We want to add a word of commendation on Lew Fields in "Old Dutch." We found it to be one of the best features we have ever run, certainly the best comedy. "DIAMOND" CREATES STIR AMONG EXHIBITORS

Many Managers Are Impressed with the Novelty of the $20,000 Prize Play, Produced by the American Film Company, at the First Private Showing in New York That They Practically Book It in the Projection Room

THE invited audience, comprised mainly of prominent New York exhibitors, who gathered to witness the first three chapters of "The Diamond from the Sky," were enthusiastic on the completion of the seven reels forming this part of the continued photoplay. Many of them booked it then and there, following the example set by their brother exhibitors after the premiere Chicago exhibition.

Similar trade performances were given throughout the country prior to the release of the first chapter of "The Diamond from the Sky," for it was the policy of John R. Freuler, president of the North American Film Corporation, and S. S. Hutchinson, treasurer, to extend to all exhibitors the privilege of seeing the picture before signing up. Both these men were present at the showing in the American theatre, New York, and expressed themselves as more than pleased with the results of their policy.

The feeling of confidence which these preliminary exhibitions instilled in the minds of exhibitors was sufficient to insure large bookings on the picture, for actual proof that the story is as good as advertised accompanied each performance.

Anxious to Learn Author's Name

Many who saw the first seven reels at the New York exhibition were extremely anxious to learn the identity of the author of this picturized romantic novel. His name, or perhaps it's her's, is not to be disclosed until May 3, the release day of the first three reels. Mr. Freuler went no further than to say that the author was prominent in both literary and motion-picture fields, and that when the name was announced it would create a great surprise.

Suffice it to say that the pleasing effect created by the first three chapters, as regards the realism and even continuity of theme, the excellently conceived situations, and the clever contrasts of drama and comedy, very often intermingled with logically brought about thrills, well substantiates Mr. Freuler's statement regarding the capability and prominence of the mysterious author

On the appearance of the story in its picturized form, it will also run serially in many leading papers throughout the country. Both the picture and the novel will tally exactly in regard [illegible] author and scenario w[illegible] busy collaborating o[illegible]

Ere the showing was over those who could find words in which to express their opinion of the picture were unanimous in declaring it one of the best that they had ever witnessed, both from the standpoint of photography, the sustained interest of the romantic story and in its sensational and thrilling developments that are bound to pull the public back to the theaters in which it is to be shown, while many others were so charmed by the picture that they found themselves utterly unable to put into words their appreciation.

THE DIAMOND FROM THE SKY

Chicago, April 16.—On May 3 the North American Film Corporation, with headquarters in Chicago and special representatives in every Mutual exchange, will release the first three reels of one of the greatest serial conceptions that has yet been brought forth.

This is The Diamond From the Sky, selected from The Chicago Tribune's serial photoplay competition as the most unique effort that film-dom has yet seen. More than nineteen thousand photoplays were sent in and examined in this contest. The Diamond From the Sky is reported to be a product of genius. Of a genius as yet unknown to fame—at least the fame that has been connected with the making of motion pictures. On Sunday, May 2—the day before the release of the first reels—the name of the author will be revealed in every Sunday paper that is to carry the serial.

Ten thousand dollars has already been paid to the fortunate and gifted author. An additional $10,000 will be offered and paid to the person who, during the progress of the pictured story, as it is thrown on the screen throughout the land, will write a scenario that will be selected as the fitting sequel to its intense and unusual current and ending.

The Chicago Tribune, that conducted this contest, was the father of the serial story idea in the United States, and its circulation was increased one hundred per cent thereby. With the screening of this marvelous photoplay it is expected that The Tribune will become the most talked about daily in the country.

The North American Film Corporation, which will merchandise this epoch marking film, was organized principally by J. R. Freuler with a view to giving the film absolutely the best in the field of distribution, sale and speedy publicity.

The production's beautiful photography, the rapid but well-sustained action as the compelling story is developed, and the superb acting of the principals, won round after round of applause. Altogether, while the exhibitors who viewed the opening chapters had been led to expect much, they found that the reality vastly [illegible] their expectations.

"Why don't you release more 'HAM' Comedies?" writes A. Bauernfreund, owner of the Model and Comet Theatres, Bronx, New York City. "In putting this question, I voice my patrons' sentiments as well as my own."

"HAM" and "BUD"

"are great favorites with the people who patronize my theatres and 'HAM' Comedy days are invariably my big days."

Now, Mr. Bauernfreund's theatres are literally surrounded by competing houses and probably nowhere else in New York is competition so terrific. Consequently, if 'HAM' Comedies can bring big business to the Comet and to the Model, isn't it only reasonable to assert that they can do the same for YOU?

Rushing the Lunch Counter is the next of these mirth-provokers. "HAM" and "BUD" land jobs as waiters in a railroad lunch room. Although they're fired in a hurry, they hold down their jobs long enough to provide laughs galore for your patrons!

A TRIO CAST AT THEIR BEST

Mabel Trunnelle, Gladys Hulette and Augustus Phillips in the Remarkable 3-act Feature, "THE WRONG WOMAN"

From a famous English play of undying popularity

In "The Wrong Woman" you get the girl that won her way and hearts in the winning "Alice's Opportunities"—Mabel Trunnelle, now for the first time as an adventuress. In "The Wrong Woman" you get all the melodramatic punch that that series had, because it's put on by the same producer—Richard Ridgely. But you get more—you get pictorial beauty blended into punchful situation—situations scenarioized to the brimful of suspenseful power—scenes and situations that pull one along with bated breath. In short, "It's a Ridgely picture" with three artists, Mabel Trunnelle, Gladys Hulette, and Augustus Phillips, to place into screen life a remarkable plot, masterly produced—not to overlook so good a villain as George Wright, whom we all can cordially dislike for his true-to-life smoothness. Released Friday, May 21st—3000 feet.

Another screen proof—right before our very eyes—that the new life thrilling the Edison program is due to the hard and fast—perhaps "old-fashioned" but thoroughly honest belief that it pays in the end to "Feature Features of Strength—Not Length." Seeing is believing, Mr. Exhibitor. See for yourself.

Facts and Comments

IT IS said on good authority that the Daix bill, which has now passed the Senate of Pennsylvania, will soon receive a majority in the House of Representatives. It is also claimed that the governor favors the bill and that it is altogether likely to become a law. The most important provision in the bill is the allowance of an appeal from the decision of the censor to the Court of Common Pleas of any county in the state. This does, indeed, blunt the edge of censorship. The antics of the present chief censor have been criticized not only by the film men, but also by the public generally. His nonsensical rules, his alternating severity and laxness have brought a good deal of adverse comment. Film men will rejoice to think that his absolute control bids fair to be abolished. There are other good provisions in the bill, such as the reduction of the inspection fee and the narrowing of the powers of the censor, as, for instance, the ban on any interference with advertising material and posters.

THE gigantic colored "insert" in this week's issue of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD announcing the progress and the projects of one of the younger and most ambitious feature program companies has a value and a significance far beyond its actual contents. Such a stroke of enterprise shows the underlying soundness of the industry. No mere mushroom growth and no temporary boom is capable of bringing forth such results. It is an unassailable argument against the men of little faith. The question in the industry today is not whether it will endure, for nothing seems more foolish than such a question. It is the future development of the industry, its growing power in the world of amusements and the various lines of its coming progress which invite the attention of all who give any study to the subject. We do not hesitate to say that this extraordinary departure which is witnessed in our columns this week must be illuminating to all who are interested in the possibilities of the future.

WE SHOULD like to know by what manner of reasoning the Ohio Board of Censors justifies its recent ruling that all eliminated portions of censored films are forfeit to the state of Ohio. An attentive reading of the statute under which the Board came into being reveals no trace of any such power vested in the Board. The eliminated portions of films remain the property of the owner of the film. The Board of Censors in another neighboring state may find no fault in the eliminated portions and may allow them to stand. This, of course, means that the owner of the film has to keep mending and altering his film and supplying new parts all the time. The law must specifically allow the seizure and destruction of films, otherwise the censors are plainly exceeding their authority. We learn that the object of this new rule is to use the eliminated portions as material for a pro-censorship campaign. Of course, it is an unfair way of doing things. If we are allowed to work with garbled extracts we can make the Bible and all the great classics of literature look like exhibits in Anthony Comstock's chamber of horrors.

THE grim God of War now enthroned in old Europe has wrought havoc in the ranks of the film men. The German motion picture journals which still reach us at irregular intervals carry an appalling list of wounded and dead from the motion picture ranks. Among them are exhibitors, operators, lecturers, producers, exchangemen, supply dealers and, indeed, every kind of men employed and interested in film enterprises. But few French motion picture journals have reached us of late and these few look like shadows of their former selves. In the last issue of our esteemed contemporary, "Ciné Journal," we find a most interesting editorial written on the field of battle by the editor, M. Georges Dureau. M. Dureau informs his readers that he is now a "brancadier of the Second Batallion of the 282nd Infantry, Territorial Division." We wish we had the space to reproduce his letter, full of the unconquerable Gallic spirit and full of that picturesque fire we associate with the people of Gascony. He speaks of his adventures at the front and says: "The film telling of my odyssey will be a long one. . . After all isn't a man of forty lucky to be alive at such a moment as this? . . When we get ready to make the film showing the Allies entering Constantinople we will avenge the beastly triumph of the ancient Mohammedan conqueror." Bravo Monsieur Brancadier.

Bargain Counter Journalism.

By W. Stephen Bush.

THE glory and the pride of the American press have always been its independence and its lively sense of a public duty. Its conduct on the whole has been dictated by conscience. The ethics of the press have been sound and simple. Considering themselves the servants of the public the editors and publishers have recognized the rights of the public to be accurately informed and to be conscientiously advised. These facts stand out prominently in the history of the American press. Even when swayed by political partisanship and while "pointing with pride" to their own party and "viewing with alarm" the other fellow's party they would try to conduct their news columns fairly and impartially.

In no department was this fairness and impartiality more conspicuous than in its treatment of news and events in the theatrical world. Indeed all the great papers prided themselves on their independent criticism. Even ten years ago no poor play could have been "puffed" into a success by lavish advertising.

To the old school of journalism the distinction between the counting room and the editorial sanctum was very real and concrete. Editorial praise was not for sale. Plays were judged simply upon their merits. Mistakes were made, but they were rare, for the criticizing and reviewing was generally in competent and experienced hands. The result was the gain of public confidence. Nor was this the only gain. The drama improved ethically and artistically. The men with salacious subjects or with stupid plays were inspired with a wholesome fear. The taste of the public was guarded against vitiation and debasement. Theater goers were educated to look for high standards.

Unfortunately within the last few years a great change for the worse has come over the press, at least here in this city, and, we fear, all over the country. It is now only a question of money to get the approval exuberantly expressed of all the star and "fancy" writers. If enough money is spent for advertising the chorus of approval is sure to follow.

Impartial criticism is out of the question. The reviewer receives his cue from the counting room and his response is as automatic as the working of the slot machine which is set in motion by the deposit of a nickel. His independence of thought has been bartered away and he has become the tool of the press agent. The worst of it is that he sails under false colors. He does all the things which the press agent is supposed to do in the guise of a writer whose judgment cannot be bought.

It has happened that an occasional feature thus catapulted into popularity had genuine merit. It has, however, happened more frequently than an inferior and mischievous production has been foisted upon public favor by these ways and means of indirection. Serious faults are overlooked and the public is deceived. Notice is served on all producers of plays or films that they will be treated not upon the merits of their work but strictly upon the amount of cash which they leave in the business office.

It is thought that the public cannot discriminate and that like a flock of sheep they will follow wherever a clever press agent will lead them. It is thought that the unanimous praise of the metropolitan papers, though secured at "so much per," will be joyfuly accepted by the press of the whole country and that no one will dare to register his dissent. It is quite possible that such a state of affairs may endure for a little while, but eventually it will do a vast amount of harm. Standards will be lowered and confused. The respect of the public for the press and for the theater will be diminished. But recently the editor of a prominent daily in conversation with the writer attributed the decline of the legitimate stage in part at least to the surrender of the press to the publicity promoter. The public, he said, lost faith not only in the critics but in the plays themselves. Every play was called a masterpiece and the columns that were wont to dispense intelligent and constructive criticism had become mere channels for superlatives.

Ever since the daily press has been forced, not through choice but through necessity, to devote space and attention to motion pictures, the same evil that characterized the theatrical department has invaded the motion picture sections. The man who bought the most advertising received the most "write-ups." Indeed, there is little attempt at concealment. Our friends of the daily press evidently see nothing wrong in it. They either believe that such a course is entirely consistent with their duty to their readers or else they do not care. It is humanly inconceivable that all the films produced within the last six months were equally good and measured up to the highest standards in every respect. This, however, is the conclusion of our friends of the daily press. The only discrimination is in the use of certain sets of superlatives of which I should say there are about seven. All the films are either "perfect" or "splendid" or "excellent" or "superb", etc., etc. Exhibitors prudently discount the "criticisms" of the daily press and wait for a judgment upon the merits for which they look to The Moving Picture World.

Exhibitors must have a dependable guide in the selection of their programs. The reviews of the films as they find them in these columns not only inform them of both the merits and the demerits of any given film, but they also tell the story of the film and thus advise the exhibitor as to whether any particular film is suitable for his program or unsuitable. Newspapers may deceive the public for a considerable time with impunity, rejoicing in the shekels of the advertiser. The exhibitor who takes any liberties with his public or who makes mistakes through lack of proper information cannot continue in business very long. Hence the duty of a moving picture journal to its exhibiting readers. The latter are entitled to the fullest and most accurate and the most independent treatment of all films. They have a right to ask for it.

It is a common saying among exhibitors that The Moving Picture World is the "film bible." It is a flattering and affectionate way of saying that the paper is thoroughly reliable and that its judgment is accepted with respect and confidence. We would ill deserve this tribute of loyalty if we did not set the interest of the exhibitor above every other interest. We depend upon the exhibitor and the exhibtor depends upon us.

Nor does fairness with the exhibitor mean anything but fairness to the advertiser. When we speak of criticism we mean constructive criticism, which not only mentions a defect, but suggests a remedy. The experienced producer never objects to that kind of criticism, but welcomes it. He knows that a good film will receive a warm welcome at all times and he knows that the exhibitor is ready to believe a reviewer who does not always hurl superlatives of praise at everything he sees.

Contrast.*

By Louis Reeves Harrison.

QUITE a number of those fine gentlemen who dissertate on the dramaturgic have attempted to name some essential principle of the stage drama which should set it apart from the epic and from prose fiction. Even Brander Matthews says "If this essential principle can be discovered, then we shall be in possession of the sole law of the drama, the one obligation which all writers for the stage must accept." He thereupon draws a conclusion from a large number of plays he has intelligently examined and discovers that "Some one central character wants something." He further announces gravely that in every successful play, ancient or modern, we shall find the clash of contending desires. This arm-chair discovery is not quite so remarkable as it is interesting, and it does not set the stage drama apart from prose fiction. Every writer of stories instinctively recognizes that the human will in action is bound to furnish a large part of his material, but why impose such a code of restrictions upon any art? The Professor would leave us no room for expansion.

In referring to the use of contrast in moving pictures, I fully recognize that the expedient is shared in common by all mediums of emotional expression, but it seems to be invested with freedom from difficulty in the newest of arts and to permit going back of conduct to the cause of it more than is always possible in the specialized and limited art of the theater. Noted dramatic antithesis is that of Othello and Iago. "Imagine," says Bernard Shaw in the Metropolitan, "the scene in which Iago poisons Othello's mind against Desdemona conveyed by dumb show!" Taking the distinguished dramatist at his word, and admitting the tremendous loss of Iago's fascinating intellectuality, there could be shown by screen methods, not only the contrast of character through conduct, but, what is sorely lacking in the play, the motive behind Iago's "motiveless malignity." "Iago," says one of Shakespeare's greatest admirers, "is too venomous. His villainy is too cruel, too steadfast to be human; perfect pitiless malignity is as impossible to man as perfect innate goodness." Imagine the difficulty of explaining the seemingly inexplicable through the medium of words, "the motive hunting of motiveless malignity," in this notable triumph of the dramatic art, yet screen methods permit, by throwing back to motive behind Iago's strange conduct, constant intensifying revelation of his character and purposes, and every word picture used by Iago to inflame Othello's mind can be made far more vivid by direct exhibition to the human eye.

Back into contrast of character screen methods may draw us, before the main action takes place, back into contrast of environment, into contrast of compelling circumstance, even into contrast of mood. If screen visualization has a distinguishing peculiarity, such as Professor Mathews seeks to differentiate the drama, though far from being an exclusive possession, it is that it lends itself broadly and generously to contrast. By way of contrasting screen presentation to that of the stage, for the benefit of Bernard Shaw and all others in authority, imagine the silent visualization of Othello creeping into the chamber of Desdemona intent on murder, as opposed to the average stage player creeping in so as to make no noise then bellowing at the top of his voice, "Yet she must die, else she'll betray more men."

I heard Salvini shout this noble sentiment in a voice calculated to rouse a toper on the rear gallery seat, yet Desdemona never fluttered an eyelid. Imagine it! In this bedchamber scene, Othello is swayed at one moment by the hateful passions Iago had fanned into flame, but this can not be made visible to remote portions of an audience, so he is compelled to shout it at us. The figures of Othello and Sleeping Desdemona may be brought up into small scope on the screen, so that the hideous workings of his mind may be more eloquently revealed in silence—he is seemingly only a few yards away—we penetrate the secrets of his mind and heart—and it is no longer necessary for us to be megaphoned that his resolution wavers in his passion for her. Her "body and beauty" are there before our eyes—explanation of his sudden fits of tenderness is unnecessary. Imagine it!

In demonstrating the capacity for good and evil in human nature, screen methods permit the return at any moment, for purposes of emphasis, to those dominating influences which sway human conduct. We may even delve into the early formative period of character and show how it was sympathetically nourished by intelligence and misshapen by ignorance. Asking an audience to look upon this picture and then upon that not only helps to make the screen story "a factory of thought, a prompter of conscience and an elucidator of social conduct," but it may contribute to our slowly acquired store of truth. Small as the number of English-speaking people completely submerged in ignorance may be, an enormous number are in a state of semisubmergence.

Scenic contrast, impossible to present with any degree of rapidity on the stage, robs the older medium of advantages with which the younger one is richly endowed. Sketchy views of life in the open can be opposed to the cramping influences of city environment. The actual squalor of tenement-house poverty can be illustrated in realistic street views, where men, women and children are crowded into filthy and disease-producing intercourse, and thrown into instantaneous contrast with whatever relief is afforded by smiling Nature in her sweetest moments.

If the essence of dramatic action lies in the opposition of human will to circumstance, the circumstances can only be described in prose fiction and but faintly indicated on the stage. They can be shown in all their infinite variety on the screen. Even in recent achievement, photodramas have revived some of the long-lost splendors of setting, the natural framework for action, and the trend is now towards aesthetic ideals that no stage presentation can afford to copy if such a thing was possible. Always broader in its possibilities, the new art is now richer in scenic contrast and ever ready to enrich itself from the wondrous resources of nature.

Most delightful of all contrasts, and possibly the most subtle of all, is that of mood. Once in a while, for some reason not yet definitely determined, the intense human being is at the mercy of mood. Where there is no permanent conversion of character a man of kind heart and gentle deeds becomes a gloomy misanthrope, even a raging demon. As suddenly, without obvious reason, he returns to his normal disposition and conduct—he is subject to variation. This form of contrast is as dangerous as it is difficult to portray. He is often a creature of dual life, because of innate peculiarity. The use of contrast thus embraces parallelism conflict of character, anthithesis of scene, and an element of suspense growing out of moods mysterious.

May Open on Sundays

Court of Appeals of New York Decides Sunday Opening Is Legal, Despite Regulations to the Contrary.

THE Court of Appeals of New York state has just rendered a decision to the effect that the opening of motion picture theaters within the state of New York is entirely legal and that no local authorities have any jurisdiction to change this law.

The matter came on to be heard before the Court of last resort in this state through an appeal from a decision in favor of the motion picture theater owners of Yonkers. The exhibitors in Yonkers relying on the ruling laid down by Judge Gaynor when the latter was on the bench of the Appellate Division in the Second Department had opened their theaters on Sunday and one of them had submitted to arrest in order to bring the question to an issue in court. The arrest followed on the application of the City Attorney of Yonkers, who claimed that the exhibitor had violated an ordinance of the Board of Aldermen of the City of Yonkers forbidding the opening of all motion picture theaters in the City of Yonkers. The alleged violator of the ordinance was tried and convicted and appealed to the Appellate Division which reversed the conviction on the ground "that the Legislature alone may command how Sunday shall be kept." The opinion then rendered held further that "the City of Yonkers cannot independently compel and enforce Sunday closing by means of fines and imprisonment unless such power is part of the law and policy granted by the legislature.

From this decision the corporation counsel of Yonkers appealed to the Court of Appeals which as above reported has sustained the doctrine laid down by the Appellate Division. Under this decision, now fully approved by the highest court in the state, local authorities have no right to interfere with the opening of motion picture theaters on Sunday anywhere within the jurisdiction of the state of New York.

An Important Explanation

A VERY large number of half-sheet advertising cards have been distributed by the Metro Picture Corporation in and about New York City and possibly in other large cities. The wording of these cards and especially the arrangement of the type might lead to the impression that the MOVING PICTURE-WORLD had some share in this plan. As a matter of fact the MOVING PICTURE WORLD, though its name is used on the cards, was not consulted as to the arrangement of either text or type. Any inference that we are in any way interested in the authorship or the distribution of the card must, therefore, be disavowed. These cards are simply the result of the enterprise and progressiveness of the publicity department of the Metro Pictures Corporation. We take this occasion to say that while we are always pleased to cooperate with any of our advertisers in promoting special publicity of such a kind, we request that all advertising matter mentioning the MOVING PICTURE WORLD, or using its name in any way whatever, be submitted to the management of the paper for consultation and approval.

CHINESE ACTOR ENTERTAINS PATHE PRODUCERS.

Ah Ling Foo, one of the real Chinese actors in Pathé's "Exploits of Elaine," gave a dinner at the Oriental Restaurant in Pell street, New York, the other night to the Whartons, producers of the "Exploits," Mrs. Bess Wharton, E. A. MacManus of the Hearst forces, Mr. Gordon, assistant to the Whartons, and Mr. and Mrs. J. Whitworth Buck. A full line of Chinese delicacies was served, including real bird's nest soup, a rarity that costs about $5 a plate in this country.

Throng at Bunny's Funeral

Famous Motion Picture Comedian Is Laid at Rest in Evergreen Cemetery.

MORE than 1,500 persons, including many prominent in theatrical and motion picture activities, attended the funeral services of John Bunny at the Elks' Club, New York, on April 28. The services were in charge of New York Lodge, No. 1, of the Elks, of which Mr. Bunny was a life member, and the St. Cecile Lodge of Masons. The Elks' ceremonies for the dead were conducted by the officers of the lodge and these were followed by the Masonic ritual. Interment was in Evergreen Cemetery the following morning.

The body of Mr. Bunny was taken from his Brooklyn home a few hours before the services and the coffin, banked with flowers, sent by his friends and former associates, was placed in front of the lodge altar. The main floor and the boxes of the mezzanine floors were filled with people, most of them wearing red carnations, the amaranth of the Elks. The pallbearers, chosen from the Vitagraph Company, were William T. Rock, Samuel Spedon, Maurice Costello, Edward Scranton, George Baker, VanDyck Brooks, Harry Morey and Lee Beggs.

A list of those present would include nearly all of the well-known motion picture men in the neighborhood of New York, in addition to many representatives of the stage. Charles Frohman, David Belasco and Jesse L. Lasky were among the early arrivals; the Lubin Company was represented by Donald C. Scott, who brought a great cluster of roses, picked on the Lubin farm at Betzwood, and included in the Vitagraph party were Jay Dwiggins, Flora Finch, Mary Maurice, Kate Price, Lillian Walker, Earle Williams, Anita Stewart, Edith Storey and Wilfred North. Others in the throng that filled the rooms to their capacity, were Lionel Adams, who worked with Bunny in his first engagement, John T. Kelly and William McCoy, friends of his early days; Captain Jack Crawford, the poet scout, Ben Teal, King Baggot and James Kirkwood.

TO THE MEMORY OF JOHN BUNNY.

Good-bye, good clown,
Indeed thou wert a merry fool,
Thy unctuous wit and rotund shape
Could wring kind wrinkles from the wisest face.
Thy life was not in vain,
For richly didst thou earn the gratitude
Of mankind of thy time.
Ten hundred thousand friends for years will tell
The stories of the parts thou played so well,
And laugh again as they recall
Thy droll pomposity.
Thy "Bottom" was the top of classic humor,
And earned for thee a name,
Fit to be graven in the Hall of Fame.
Thou passed too soon,
But memory will keep thy name forever honored.
"Requiescat in pace."

HERALD SQUARE THEATER CLOSED.

The passing of the Herald Square Theater, New York, the first of the Broadway houses to be devoted exclusively to moving pictures, took place Thursday, April 30. The theater had a long and honorable history as a home of the spoken drama to its credit, when, on March 25, 1912, Marcus Loew inaugurated his policy of first run pictures, a policy which proved successful from the start, and brought the art of the screen into the brilliant light of the Great White Way. In the theater that had been originally a cyclorama, and to which Harrigan & Hart transferred their plays of local life, from the old house at Tenth street, where Edwin Booth, Richard Mansfield, Anna Held and numerous lesser celebrities had appeared, and where Sam and Lee Shubert began their careers as New York managers, the film drama has held the fort for the last three years, and seen friendly rivals come into being upon the famous thoroughfare: The Vitagraph, The Strand, The Broadway. The hand of the wrecker is now laid upon it, and a towering commercial building will eventually cover the entire block between Thirty-fifth and Thirty-Sixth streets.

GARRICK A PICTURE THEATER.

With the closing of the Herald Square theater, a new home for the pictures has been found in the Thirty-fourth street section of Broadway, Jerome and Walter Rosenburg having secured the Garrick theater on Thirty-fifth street, and opening Monday, May 3. The program is made up of General, United and Mutual first-run films. A symphony orchestra supplies the music. The house, under the personal management of Jerome Rosenburg, is open from 9 a. m. to 11 p. m. Later, midnight performances will be added.

Arguments on Fight Films.

Federal Court Hears Extended and Interesting Appeal on Behalf of Owner—Judge Haight Voices Doubts As to Their Admissibility—A Picturesque and Eventful Day in Chambers At Newark.

By W. Stephen Bush.

THERE is no doubt about the volume and the sincerity of the effort to get the Willard-Johnson fight films past the frowning watchfulness of Uncle Sam. No, I do not speak of an attempt to smuggle the pictures into the country; federal jails are still too severe and confining for any effort in that direction. I speak of the legal fight, the chief battle of which occurred last week in the large, elegant but somewhat garish court room of the United States District Court for the District of New Jersey, at Newark, N. J. L. Lawrence Weber, the man who says he is the owner of the films, through his attorneys, Towne and Spellman, served a demand on Frederick S. Freed, Deputy Collector of U. S. customs in charge of Port of Newark, N. J. Here is the text of the demand:

Demand for Delivery Refused.

Hon Frederick S. Freed,
Deputy Collector of U. S. Customs, in charge of Port of Newark, N. J.

Sir:

The undersigned, the owner of certain photographic-film positives for use in connection with moving-picture exhibits, and designed to be used for the purpose of public exhibition, of a certain encounter of pugilists namely: Jess Willard and Jack Johnson, held at the City of Havana, in the Republic of Cuba, on the 5th day of April, 1915, hereby demands the right to enter through the United States Customs at the Port of Entry in the City of Newark, in the State of New Jersey, the said photographic-film positives, on payment of the duties prescribed by law.

The undersigned hereby states that his object in importing the said photographic-film positives is for the purpose of publicly exhibiting the same in the United States, under his personal management, control and supervision, and not for the purpose of traffic, sale or commerce.

Yours very truly,
L. LAWRENCE WEBER.

Towne & Spellman,
Attorneys for L. Lawrence Weber,
115 Broadway, N. Y. City.

Brief and formal as was the demand, the answer of Hon. Freed, etc., was even more so. Here it is:

"Original received and request refused."

At this juncture the victory rested with Uncle Sam when L. Lawrence Weber flung down the legal gauntlet commonly known as a petition for an injunction. Mr. Weber's attorneys obtained an order from Justice Thomas G. Haight compelling the Federal District Attorney to show cause why Weber's prayer for a restraining order against Collector Freed should not be granted. There had been some adjournments of the argument on this order, the scene had shifted from Trenton to Jersey City and from Jersey City to Newark, where it was finally heard and submitted.

A Powerful Argument for Admission.

The chief argument for the owner of the films was made by Ex-U. S. Senator Towne, a white-haired gentleman of distinguished presence. It was full of keen incisive logic, of earnest appeal and replete with legal learning. Though the hearing had been set for an early hour in the afternoon it was well past three o'clock before Judge Haight was ready to listen. All people who have business in Judge Haight's court are struck by his startling resemblance to the Lincoln of the younger days. It is no contempt of court to speculate on the age of the judge (the ultimate triumph of the suffragettes may cause a change). It does not look as if Judge Haight was past thirty. The resemblance to Lincoln is more than a mere physical likeness; he has the same nervous mobile lines about the mouth, the native tact and patience and as was shown by a sensational incident in the course of the afternoon, the same tender heart.

The gist of Mr. Towne's argument was this: The Federal Government has no power or jurisdiction in this whole matter, unless it be contended that these prize fight films are articles of commerce.

"We most emphatically deny that these films are articles of commerce," declared the former Senator. "It has been decided again and again that theatrical exhibitions, operas, plays and the like are not articles of commerce. If this contention is correct then Congress has no power in the premises. Its sole jurisdiction rests upon the clause of the Federal Constitution which vests the power to 'regulate commerce between the several states' in Congress. The attempt of Congress to interfere in this matter of the films is simply a federal usurpation of the police power which must be exercised by the several states and which cannot be taken away from the states by the Federal Government. It is no part of the functions of Congress to regulate the morals of the people in the several states. The states are amply able to look out for that without any assistance or even advice of the Federal powers. There are twenty-eight states in the Union in which prize fights are forbidden by law; this shows that the state governments are alive to their duty of protecting the morals of the people.

No Man Can Have Commerce with Himself.

"I will grant, however, for the sake of argument, that these films may become the subject of interstate traffic and may in that way come under the regulation of Congress. Even if this were true it would by no means affect our position in this case. We do not want to traffic in these films, and no man can trade with himself. The owner wants to exhibit these films and he surely has the right to have them shipped to himself from place to place or to carry them himself from place to place. If you hold otherwise then it might be unlawful for us to bring our law books over from New York into New Jersey without coming under the regulation of the interstate commerce commission, and you must hold that a New Jersey doctor for instance must obey the interestate commerce regulations before he can bring his surgical instruments into another state to perform an operation. Then baseball players and football players travelling from one state to another to give exhibition performances come under the rules of the interstate commerce commission."

Judge Haight Has His Doubts.

Justice Haight interrupted Mr. Towne's argument several times. He pointed out a case to the lawyer, where a man had sent for a woman from a different state and had been held to have violated the Mann act though no prostitution had taken place. The case cited was that of the United States against the Ex-Champion Jack Johnson. The question seemed to portend a hostile train of thought in the judicial mind and counsel for the owner of the film vigorously denied that there was any analogy between the cases. He asked the Court whether the bringing in of the negatives would constitute a violation of the law.

"Does your Honor hold," Senator Towne urged, "that if the plaintiff in this proceedings brings in the negatives with no intention of doing anything further with them he would be violating the law? Would the Collector have a right to refuse delivery of the films if my client wanted to import the negative with no intention to have any positive prints made?"

The Law Is Sweeping in Its Terms.

"I do not know," the Court answered with a quizzical smile, "you know the law forbids the importation of such films if they are designed to be used or may be used for purposes of public exhibition.' You know those words 'may be used' reach pretty far."

Just at this moment, as the judge seemed ready to disclose a little more of what was running in his mind, a jury in a criminal case filed in finding the prisoner guilty. A moment later there came a piercing cry from the wife of the man who screamed out hysterically that her husband "had done nothing wrong."

A Tragic Interruption.

It took some time before the woman could be removed and the judge, who was visibly affected and visibly trying to hide his shock, announced a short recess, saying "he would have to have a little smoke to get back his nerves." Fred Mace, who was an interested spectator in the Court, joined a group in the corridor saying that "there was nothing like a court room for getting ideas for a scenario" and adding "that the episode in the court had furnished him with materials for at least one scenario. At last an ambulance arrived, the suffering woman was taken away and the hearing was resumed.

Senator Towne having finished his argument, he was followed by District Attorney Joseph Bodine, who spoke very briefly, citing the language of the statute. He said there could be no doubt that the law was applicable to this case and he cited a few authorities, notably the Supreme Court decision in the Lottery Ticket case, in support of his theory that Congress had jurisdiction of the subject matter. The remarks of the District Attorney hardly occupied more than five minutes, and he was succeeded by Attorney Spellman for the petitioner and owner of the films.

"Losing Ten Thousand a Day."

Mr. Spellman claimed that his client was losing at the rate of eight to ten thousand dollars a day through the detention of the films. If a decision was delayed or if he was remitted to his ordinary remedy at law instead of getting an injunction the films would be wellnigh valueless by the time a trial on the issues could be had in the ordinary course of procedure. Mr. Spellman said a good deal more, assuring the court that his client was entirely in the hands of the Court and that an adverse ruling at this time would harm him irreparably. Judge Haight was sympathetic, but not excessively so. In fact, his sympathy was under perfect control. He said he thought that an appeal against his order could be brought on for a speedy hearing. Mr. Spellman thought otherwise, and the judge consulted the Rules of the Court and repeated his remark about a possible speedy appeal.

"Now, I do not forecast my decision," he said, soothingly, "but in case there is a decision that you wish to appeal from I am inclined to think you can hurry it along."

Speedy Decision Promised.

Neither Mr. Towne nor Mr. Spellman seemed to take much comfort out of this assurance. They urged the judge to remember that he had to decide a brand new question never raised before and that he was not bound by precedents. Counsel took new hope when the judge asked them just what kind of an injunction they would like to have. They knew what they wanted and promised to enter into all kinds of stipulations if the injunction were granted. Judge Haight brought the argument to a close by assuring counsel of an early decision and taking all the briefs offered said he would try to read them on the train going back and forth between Trenton and Newark.

The hearing had been attended by a number of film men and sporting stars, among them Jack Curley, Fred Mace and State Boxing Commissioner Neil, of New York.

Kleine's Italian Studio

Magnificent New Plant Just Completed Near Turin on Most Approved Lines.

GEORGE KLEINE'S beautiful Italian Studio, work on which was completed recently, is probably the most unique institution of its kind in the world. All that is best in domestic studios was combined with the superior features of foreign establishments, with results that certainly set a new standard in studio construction.

The new Kleine Studio is located on the site of an old walled estate about five miles from the city of Turin. This beautiful demesne, surrounded by eighteen-foot walls, comprises ten acres, superbly laid out, its crux being a spacious villa four centuries old, surrounded by a magnificent grove of ancient trees. The grounds are charmingly diversified with many varieties of shrubbery and flowering plants, beautiful vistas with the distant foothills and mountains shadowy in the background, and a delightful lake fairly alive with plant and animal life, enhance the natural view. Throughout the grounds are avenues of stately trees, planted in cross effect, and many formal gardens. On the property are splendid examples of Swiss chalet, characteristic German and French buildings and several other styles of architecture, ancient and modern, that can be used for pictorial purposes.

The administration building is the ancient villa to the right center of the photograph; and the entire plant follows the modern unit system throughout in arrangement. The first building erected was a studio of medium (ideal) size, 100x40 feet, with glass sides, in which has been installed an American heating and ventilating plant, assuring warmth in winter and coolness in summer. Close by is the building for developing and printing, while a large depot for properties, together with a well-equipped carpenter shop and a spacious scenic department are located across the plaza. This unique, artistic reservation, with its lovely groves of ancient trees, its wealth of flowering plants, its luxuriance of shrubbery, its fairy lake bordered with myrtle, furnishes environment and inspiration that is really rare.

The architectural planning and equipment of this remarkable plant is thoroughly modern, including rest places and dressing rooms for an army of people (a detail generally disregarded in European picture plants), a large restaurant and many modern conveniences for artists and auxiliaries. These are comprised in a structure known as the Long Building (310 feet in length), which nestles along the shadow of the north wall of the enclosure. It hardly need be remarked that the mechanical and optical equipment of this establishment is second to none—it is a unique and complete settlement, sufficient unto itself, isolated; yet, in easy reach of the thriving city of Turin.

BLACKTON ADDRESSES THEATER CLUB.

J. Stuart Blackton, of the Vitagraph Company of America, and Wilton Lackaye, the actor, were the principal speakers at a meeting of the New York Theater Club Tuesday afternoon in the Hotel Astor. Mr. Blackton discussed the "Technic of the Motion Picture as Compared with the Stage," while Mr. Lackaye spoke on "The American Actor."

There was also a program of motion pictures showing the progress of the art of moving photography. Incidentally a series of pictures of Violet Virginia Blackton, taken every six months from the age of one year to seven, proved of great interest to the several hundred members of the club which filled the grand ball-room.

After tracing the growth of the motion picture business, Mr. Blackton said that he had been requested by Mrs. Belle de Rivera, the president of the club, to cite some figures showing the growth of the business.

"We who are engaged in making moving pictures," declared Mr. Blackton, "constantly are animated with a desire for better things and for improvement. With the wonderful possibilities offered by the camera we are impressed by the opportunities for good that are entrusted to us.

"I have been asked to give some statistics of the motion picture business, and the figures I quote are for the year 1913. During that time there was $20,000,000 paid by the film exchange, the wholesale distributor to the manufacturer. The theaters paid $25,000,000 for rental of the films, and the public paid $275,000,000 for admission to the various theaters. This means an average of 11,000,000 people attended the theater daily to see the moving pictures. During the same time manufacturers had tied up in the business $25,000,000 and about $50,000,000 worth of feature films unreleased."

WARNER HAS "UNCLE SAM AT WORK."

During the past week arrangements have been made by which A. Warner secured the rights for the United States for "Uncle Sam at Work" from Henry J. Savage. This picture shows the various departments of the Government at Washington busy with the affairs of the Nation. It was written by Frederic J. Haskin. Already the picture has played long engagements in a number of the larger cities and has aroused deep interest. A critical review of "Uncle Sam at Work" will appear in an early issue of the Moving Picture World.

The Motion Picture Exhibitor

KENTUCKY EXHIBITORS MEET.

Fourth Annual Convention of the Kentucky State Branch of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League at Lexington.

KENTUCKY exhibitors met at Lexington, Ky., on April 21, to hold a two-day convention of the Kentucky State Branch, No. 7, of the Moving Picture Exhibitors' League of America. About fifty delegates were present at the meeting, including supply men, exchange men, etc. The meeting was one of the best that the association has held in some time. The most important thing accomplished was the appointment of a live membership committee, which expects to increase the present membership of fifty to about one hundred by the time the next annual convention rolls around.

At the business sessions no one but exhibitors belonging to the association was permitted in the room and a part of the business transacted was of a secret nature and has been withheld. General discussions were indulged in concerning state and national censorship, children's pictures, Sunday Closing, and other big topics of the day.

The opening session of the convention started at 2.30 o'clock in the afternoon of April 21, in the ball room of the Phoenix Hotel. The meeting was called to order by J. H. Stamper, of Lexington, vice-president, who announced that L. J. Dittmar, of Louisville, president of the state body, would be unable to attend the meeting, due to serious illness in his family. The afternoon meeting was devoted entirely to routine business and reports from committees and officers. H. B. Strube, of Louisville, treasurer of the association, was unable to be present due to slight illness.

There was no night session on the first day, and the evening was given over to a banquet at the Phoenix Hotel. Fifty places were provided at the banquet and every place was filled. This banquet was free to exhibitors, exchange men, supply men and in fact anyone connected directly with the motion picture business. Music was furnished at the banquet by the combined orchestras of the Ada Meade and Orpheum theaters, and in addition a number of vaudeville acts from the Ada Meade bill were put on for the edification of the visitors. The entertainment was in charge of a committee composed of J. H. Stamper, manager of the Orpheum theater, of Lexington; N. H. Gurnee, manager of the Ada Meade theater, and R. A. Parsons, assistant manager of the Orpheum.

Among a few of the interesting film productions shown at the banquet were the first two chapters of the North American Film Corporation's production, "The Diamond from the Sky," and a set of the Renfax Talking Pictures. All exhibits were absolutely free and the state organization bore the entire expense of the banquet. About fifteen exhibits of films, machines, etc., were made.

The second session of the organization was held at the Phoenix Hotel on April 22. At this meeting it was decided to re-elect all of the officers who served during 1914-15 for another year. They are as follows: L. J. Dittmar, president; Fred A. Dolle, secretary; J. H. Stamper, of Lexington, vice-president, and H. B. Strube, of Louisville, treasurer. Louisville again got the plums in the way of officers, electing three out of four.

The time or place of meeting for the 1916 convention was not decided upon and will be left to the discretion of the Executive Board, which will meet late in the fall or early in the spring to make the arrangements.

Nelson Van Hoten Gurnee, of Lexington, Ky., was appointed on the Board of Directors in place of L. H. Ramsay, of Lexington, who went to Florida some time ago. The board is now composed of Mr. Van Gurnee, A. B. Arnett, of Midway, Ky.; L. J. Dittmar, of Louisville; Fred A. Dolle, Louisville; J. H. Stamper, Lexington, and H. B. Strube, Louisville.

The appointment of delegates and alternatives to attend the National Convention, to be held in San Francisco on July 13, was deferred until a later date or such time as it can be ascertained as to just who will attend the exposition. If possible the delegates will be chosen from the members who will attend the exposition anyway.

The treasurer's report showed that the organization was in very good financial condition, and in fact was in firmer condition than at any previous time.

New members taken into the organization were: Fred Shelton, of the Columbia theater, of Louisville, who is also a film exchange man; W. C. Crutcher, of Vine Grove, Ky., and C. H. Berryman, of Lexington, Ky., manager of the John B. Haggin estate, which controls the Ben Ali theater.

The membership committee was appointed as follows: N. H. Gurnee, Lexington, chairman; Fred M. Sheldon, Louisville; Clarence Bloomfield, Winchester; John Burkhart, Newport, and George Bleich, Owensboro. This committee expects to do a good deal during the next year to increase the the membership and attendance at the annual convention. The Louisville delegation will bring pressure to bear on the Louisville exhibitors and will make an effort to have the entire membership of the Louisville Moving Picture Exhibitors' League present at the next annual convention of the state association. The Louisville organization is one of the strongest locals in this section of the country and embraces practically every exhibitor in the city.

Among a few of the prominent men present at the convention were: Dennis Long, Fred Sheldon, M. Switow, Joe Steurle and Fred Dolle, of Louisville; N. H. Gurnee, J. H. Stamper, R. A. Parsons and C. H. Berryman, Lexington; W. P. Baxter, Richmond; Clarence Bloomfield, Winchester; J. S. Ellison, Williamstown; S. E. Parham, Louisville; J. G. Conner, Indianapolis; R. G. Remington, New York; John Burkhart, Newport; George Bleich, Owensboro, and W. C. Crutcher, Vine Grove, Ky.

PHOTOPLAYERS AT READING BALL.

Many Leading Lights of Filmdom Have Been Booked for Convention Week.

BEN. H. ZERR and Julius G. Hansen, president and secretary, respectively, of the Reading Local Motion Picture Exhibitors' League, announce that the managements of leading photoplay producing companies in the east have promised the attendance of a number of their screen favorites for the state convention to be held in Reading on June 7, 8 and 9. Messrs. Zerr and Hansen recently visited New York and returned with assurances of attendance from leading favorites of the Universal, World Film, United Film, Metro, Paramount, Vitagraph, Edison and several other well known companies.

The majority of the actors and actresses will be in Reading to attend the ball to be held in conjunction with the convention on the evening of Tuesday, June 8. A limited number of tickets will be offered the public for this occasion and plans have been prepared to so decorate the ball room that it will present one of the most beautiful and elaborate sights ever witnessed in the city of Reading. The Ringgold Band, directed by Monroe A. Althouse, has been engaged to furnish the music for the occasion.

Harry L. Reichenbach, of the Metro Film Company, has consented to donate a huge vase to be given as first prize to the best dancer at the ball. The gift will be on display in the window of the Comfort Shoe Store, I. Bear, proprietor. Mr. Reichenbach is a nephew of the Reading shoe store man.

The following names were given to Mr. Zerr by the management of the different companies visited as likely visitors to the convention: Universal—Rosemary Theby, Harry Meyers, Mary Fuller, Dorothy Philips, Ben Wilson, Matt Moore, King Baggot, Jane Gail, William Garwood and Violet Mercereau, William Farnum, Theda Baro, Betty Nansen, Stewart Holmes and William E. Shay.

Metro—Mr. Bushman, Olga Petrova, William Faversham, Florence Reed, Lionel Barrymore and Lois Meredith.

United—Ethel Grandin, Edwin August, Iva Shepard and Ruth Blair.

World Film—Robert Warwick, Barbara Tennant and Vivian Martin.

Word has been received by Frank Gould, publicity representative of the state league, from J. Allen Boone, of the Lubin Manufacturing Company, of Philadelphia, stating that among the Philadelphians at the ball will be Arthur Johnson, Lottie Briscoe, Ormi Hawley, Florence Hackett, Mary Charleson, Joseph Kauffman, Joseph Smiley and many others.

Mr. Gould recently returned from a tour of Lancaster, York and Harrisburg, urging the various exhibitors in those places to attend the convention. It is thought that several hundred out-of-town motion picture theater owners will attend the convention.

THE FIGHT IN MASSACHUSETTS.

The Massachusetts Motion Picture Exhibitors' League is continuing its fight against the proposed Carstens bill, which provides for a state paid board of three censors under the jurisdiction of the State Board of Labor and Iudustries. The work of the Co-operative Anti-Censorship Committee will undoubtedly be most effective. This committee is composed of J. A. Eslow, manager of the New England Universal Exchange; Mrs. Alice Carroll, a social worker; Alden F. Washburn of the Unique Theater, Boston; James Burke, president of the Boston Moving picture Operators' Union, and E. O. Ramsdell of Malden.

The committee has been holding daily meetings and their campaign against censorship is far reaching. Over one thousand slides telling of the detriments and unfairness of the bill are being exhibited in moving picture theaters throughout the state. Petitions are in circulation and it is believed that over a quarter of a million names will be received to present to the Senate when the bill is reported to that body by the Committee on Ways and Means.

The Boston Central Labor Union and the Massachusetts Real Estate Exchange have both passed resolutions against the bill. The real estate exchange in its resolutions, recommends that an unpaid commission of three members of the highest type of citizenship should be appointed by the governor, with full power to pass upon those films against which questions may be raised as to whether they are immoral or obscene, or incite race of creed prejudices.

MICHIGAN EXHIBITORS' CONVENTION.

The annual convention of Michigan State Branch, No. 4, Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, will take place in Lansing on June 8 and 9. At that time delegates will be elected to the San Francisco convention of the national association.

The Detroit Motion Picture Exhibitors' League has vacated its club rooms in the Equity building, and hereafter will hold its weekly meetings at 183 East Jefferson avenue, on the third floor of the building, which is used as the projection room of the Detroit Kriterion Film Company. The room will also be used for club purposes, members of the league being invited to drop in at any time and make themselves perfectly at home. The room is a large one and has a stage for use in case of special meetings.

To initiate the new quarters, the league has arranged for a meeting and banquet to take place Tuesday evening, May 11, at 10:30 p. m. There will be refreshments and cigars, as well as entertainment. Everybody is invited to come and participate in the good time.

MINNESOTA EXHIBITORS MEET.

Big Convention at Minneapolis Effects Reorganization of Trade in the Northwest.

THE first annual convention of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association of the Northwest opened at 10 o'clock Monday, May 3, the sessions being held at the West Hotel, Minneapolis. About 150 members were present. H. H. Green, president, called the meeting to order and appointed credential committee. Matters relating to the reorganization of the assocation were discussed and a committee was appointed to draft new constitution and by-laws, which were later adopted.

The new constitution provides for the inclusion of the states of Wisconsin, North and South Dakota, northern Michigan, Nebraska, Montana and Iowa. It also provides that the secretary shall receive a salary of $75 per month and $5 per month for each additional 100 members.

On Tuesday evening a banquet was held at the Dyckman Hotel, at which there was an attendance of about 400 persons. Otto N. Raths, a former exhibitor, but is now postmaster at St. Paul, was toastmaster of the occasion.

Secretary Steffes' report was read on Wednesday and referred to the executive committee and a special auditing committee.

Election of officers was scheduled to take place on Thursday, May 6. McQUADE.

LOUISIANA EXHIBITORS' OFFICERS.

The Louisiana Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association perfected organization April 24 at a meeting in the Green Room of the Grunewald Hotel. Martin L. Costley, Jr., president for organization, presided. The following officers were elected: Martin L. Costley, Jr., of the Pastime theater, president; Jac Miller of the Hippodrome, vice-president; George E. Grusch of the Coliseum, secretary; Bernard F. Brennan of the Iberville, treasurer; George Saik of the Elysium, sergeant-at-arms. These officers are elected to serve through the present year. The board of directors will meet every Saturday afternoon at the Hippodrome, the association on the second Saturday of each month in the Green Room of the Grunewald. The board, at its May 1 meeting, will name committees on arbitration, finance, membership, information and legislation. The initiation has been suspended for thirty days. This fee, together with the monthly dues, will be decided upon at the board meeting of May 8.

NORTH CAROLINA CONVENTION.

The exhibitors are looking forward with interest to their coming convention of the Exhibitors League of North Carolina, which will be held the latter part of this month at Fayetteville. Many important questions will be brought up for discussion and a program is now in the process of preparation. S. A. Lambert of Fayetteville, is president, and E. May, secretary of the league.

CHICAGO'S FOREMOST WOMAN PICTURE THEATER MANAGER.

The accompanying cut (reading from left to right) is a snapshot of Mrs. F. O. Nielsen, F. O. Nielsen and Geo. W. Strebel, taken when they were unconscious of the presence of a camera fiend, while enjoying a constitutional on one of Chicago's park boulevards.

Mr. Nielsen is owner of the Parkway, Stevens and Kimball theaters in Chicago, and permits no one to contradict the statement that his wife is the most reliable woman moving picture theater manager in their home city. When he is head over ears in work attending to the bookings of "The Spoilers," in the five states for which he holds exclusive rights, Mrs. Nielsen supervises the theater end of their business with the foresight and efficiency of a veteran commander. She books the programs, keeps an eye on the staff of each theater, and watches the box offices with the keen eye of a commissariat officer; nor is she so immersed in these multifarious duties as to forget to pass a smile and a pleasant word to patrons. Geo. W. Strebel is a close friend of the family.

"THE GUIDING LIGHT."

Mr. Otto, one of the directors of the American Film Manufacturing Co., made a trip to Point Conception Lighthouse to get scenes for "The Guiding Light," a one-reel "Flying A" subject. Besides the usual sea scapes and lighthouse locations, he secured a strong effect from the light rays, which go on just at sunset.

Fine Studios for Dyreda

J. Searle Dawley Busy Making Pictures on Top Floor of Sixty-first Street Building.

J. SEARLE DAWLEY, director general of Dyreda Art Films, and Harry Reichenbach, advertising and publicity manager of the Metro Pictures Corporation, through which the Dyreda product will be released in the future, entertained a party of motion picture men and representatives of the trade press at the new Dyreda studio at 3 West 61st street on the afternoon of April 30. After the studio had been duly inspected, the guests were distributed in taxis and taken for a few blocks north to the Empire Hotel, where tea was served, with Director Dawley presiding at the head of the table.

J. Searle Dawley.

The new quarters for the Dyreda producers, on the top floor of an automobile building, just west of Central Park, meet all the demands of a studio. The room is 290 x 92 feet, is thoroughly lighted in every part and offers space for six sets at the same time. On the afternoon of the visitation, Director Dawley was alternating between scenes for two pictures, A. E. W. Mason's "Four Feathers," in which Howard Estabrook is being featured, and "I'm Always in the Way," based on Charles K. Harris' song of the same name. The real test of the studio, however, was planned for a few days later, when an Oriental scene for use in "Four Feathers" was to be staged. According to Mr. Dawley, this part of the story requires one of the most elaborate sets ever placed in a studio.

Several producers have cast covetous eyes on this particular piece of property, if reports may be credited, for right in the heart of New York it provides exceptional facilities, and they are being utilized to their fullest extent by Dyreda's director general. Every modern device for the securing of light effects has been installed and the present policy calls for a liberal expenditure on settings that the pictures may justify the name of Art Films. Dressing rooms for the players line the walls at either side of the room and on the floor below executive offices, storage rooms and additional dressing rooms have been equipped. The present program calls for one production a month, and unless something goes wrong with Mr. Dawley's plans the Dyreda productions will be among the most popular of the Metro Corporation's releases.

Present at the official opening of the studio were J. Parker Reed, Walter J. Kingsley, John Murray, Alec Lorimer, Richard A. Rowland, Howard Estabrook, Joseph Engel, Irene Warfield, Alma Hanlon and representatives of all of the trade papers.

TURNBULL JOINS LASKY STAFF.

Hector Turnbull is giving up his position as Dramatic Critic of the New York Tribune in order to become associated with the scenario department of the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company. Mr. Turnbull is the brother of Miss Margaret Turnbull, the noted author and playwright who is already assisting Wm. C. De Mille in the preparation of scenarios for the Lasky photodramas.

Hector Turnbull has been widely known as one of the most popular and gifted of the younger metropolitan newspaper critics. Before he joined the staff of the Tribune some two years ago, he had already acquired a substantial reputation as a magazine writer, for the most desirable publications.

NORCROSS WITH GUSTAVE FROHMAN.

Frank Norcross, who has served as actor, author and manager of dramatic and musical productions and, of later years, has taken important parts in motion picture plays, has been engaged for the position of studio manager of the Frohman Amusement Corporation.

Raymond McKee, Edison Comedian

BLESSED still with all the sunny good nature of the boy and blended with a winning and infectious sense of humor, Raymond McKee, the latest chosen for honors in the Edison stock company, is a most likable sort of comedian. Best of it all, the McKee of the film always appears to be enjoying the fun with the audience—never suggesting a fun-making comedian. His is a personality that makes friends without seeming effort. But twenty-two years of age, what he already has done on the stage and screen bodes well for his future and following.

Raymond McKee.

Curiously enough, he was—much unlike our usual heroes—forced on the stage. For he apparently had chosen the career of musician and for a considerable time played in a large Chicago orchestra of over fifty pieces. Wishing to see something of the country, he joined the orchestra of a repertoire company and was on the road one night when the juvenile man took sick. The management insisted that he take the actor's place. Stage fright, even at the suggestion, never descended in such a murky cloud as it did on young McKee. He finally was forced on, they taking advantage of the fact that, through nightly repetition, he was familiar with all the lines. Though he claims he gave a ghastly performance for several nights, the management refused to let him out of the part. Soon after he was playing the juvenile in "The English Boy," and the titular role in "The Messenger Boy." He supplemented these with several seasons with the Alhambra Stock Company, and the Orpheum Stock Company at Atlanta, Ga. Mr. McKee also played the juvenile role with Robert Hilliard, after which he went to Lubin, where he appeared in light comedy for four years, earning a large personal following by his delightful characterizations.

He went to Edison, with Director Will Louis, under whom he worked while at the Lubin studio. His first picture, "Sleep, Beautiful Sleep," was voted so good that he was immediately engaged. Since that time he has appeared in "Count Maccaroni," "A Hazardous Courtship," and "A Dumb Wooing."

SOME CENSUS FIGURES.

Some recent figures given out by the Census Bureau in Washington, give the layman an amazing glimpse into the magnitude of the film industry. According to the census officials the making of films is the fifth largest industry in the United States.

During the year 1914 up to December 1, $20,000,000 was spent in the United States in the making of motion picture negatives. Ten thousand reels of negatives, each approximately one thousand feet long, were made in the United States in these eleven months. An average of thirty-five positives (according to the Washington officials), was made from each negative. Seventeen million dollars was spent in the making of positives from the negatives. A total of $37,000,000 was thus expended for the manufacture of films.

It is estimated that at least ten million persons go daily to photoplay theaters in this country; between 850,000 and 900,000 go to moving pictures in New York; in Chicago about 385,000.

The officials state that it costs between $10,000 and $15,000 to produce the average feature of five reels and the cost of a serial, such as "Runaway June," which is in fifteen episodes of two reels each, or thirty reels in all, is something staggering. The average feature is made in a comparatively small number of locations, but when the Reliance Motion Picture Corporation made "Runaway June" the company worked in various parts of the country and even went to Bermuda. Heavy as the expense had been up to the time of going to Bermuda this ocean trip swelled the total greatly. A big ocean liner was chartered for some of the scenes and a big yacht was also put in commission.

Cosmofotofilm in New Offices.

Cromelin's Feature Company Celebrates Its First Year in Business by Moving to Larger Quarters.

THE Cosmofotofilm Company, which entered the arena of the feature film business in New York just a year ago, making its bow to the trade and public at the Strand theater, New York, with "The House of Temperley," is just entering new and extensive quarters occupying one-half of the sixth floor in the World's Tower Building, 110-112 W. 40th street, New York City. The numbers of the Suite taken are 602-604-606, which extends through from the front to the back of the World's Tower Building which is known to be one of the principal edifices in New York devoted to the motion picture industry located in the very heart of the film interests.

In the new offices of the Cosmofotofilm Company there will be the largest and most complete projection room in the World's Tower Building, with two of the best projection machines in a double-size booth and with the longest throw of any projection room in the building. The executive office, publicity department and general offices, shipping and receiving rooms have all been laid out in a manner calculated to prove most advantageously to all concerned. With a continued and ever increasing output of the superb films of the London Film Company, which have made so memorable a showing for the past year, the outlook for the Cosmofotofilm Company is, indeed, a rosy one.

Paul H. Cromelin, the head of the Cosmofotofilm Co., has always felt that the product of the London Film Company, of which the Cosmofotofilm Company is sole American distributor, was of so high a degree of quality that a good price could always be asked and maintained for same. The London Film Company has always made it its policy to employ none but the very best of talent under the able directorship of two of the greatest American producers, Harold Shaw and George Loane Tucker. Some of the very best American actresses have gone to London and taken leading parts and are still doing so in the pictures produced by the London Film Company, among whom we may mention Jane Gail and Edna Flugrath, so that the product of the London Film Company, while staged in England, is largely American in its atmosphere and its personality and of a quality which can best be vouched for by those who have been privileged to view the London Film Company's films in such theaters as the Strand theater, New York; Broadway theater, New York; Stanley theater, Philadelphia, etc.

Its very latest production, "The Middleman," featuring Mr. Albert Chevalier, England's great character impersonator, and Jane Gail, has just been disposed of to the Metro Pictures Corporation, who will undoubtedly give the subject extensive publicity, which it so richly deserves.

MOVING PICTURES SECURE NEW FIRE EQUIPMENT FOR EDGEWATER.

The Mayor and Board of Councilmen of Edgewater, N. J., have been trying for some time past to secure a new equipment for their fire fighters, but met with much opposition from the citizens. After much thought Mayor Henry Wissel and Mr. Thomas Trolson, chairman of the Finance Committee, called on the Momus Producing Company, who have a studio in Edgewater, to help them out. The Momus Co. took a picture showing Edgewater's present fire fighting apparatus, then showed the territory that had to be protected, and wound up the film by showing a modern automobile fire engine in action.

When the citizens actually SAW, the result at the polls proved conclusively that the Mayor was right. He said: "We have the pictures to thank for the Victory."

MAIBELLE HEIKES JUSTICE LIKES CALIFORNIA.

Maibelle Heikes Justice is making many new friends among the film colony and is receiving considerable social attention during her sojourn in Los Angeles. Miss Lillian Brown Leighton, star of the Selig forces, gave a dinner for Miss Justice in her pretty new bungalow in Highland Park, April 29, to which quite a few of the well-known player folk were invited to meet the author and included Wallace C. Clifton, the Selig editor, and Mrs. Clifton. May 2 being Miss Justice's birthday, a pleasant, all-day picnic was also given for her on the seashore down at San Pedro. Meantime Miss Justice is beginning some feature photodramas which will be heard from later. She considers California a romantic field for much inspiration, and is making the best of the impressions while they are new.

At Leading Picture Theaters.

"Vitagraph Theater."

WHILE interest in the Vitagraph theater program for the week commencing Sunday, May 9, centers in the two leading pictures, the three-part Broadway Star Feature, "The Esterbrook Case," and the first chapter of the Vitagraph Serial, "The Goddess," there are unusually attractive shorter comedy film also being shown. Mr. and Mrs. Sidney Drew in "The Story of a Glove," give an amusing explanation of a domestic difficulty; Harry Davenport and Rose Tapley impersonate Mr. and Mrs. Jarr in No. 8 of Roy L. McCardell's Jarr Family Series, and show how "Mr. Jarr Visits His Home Town;" in "Jane Was Worth It" Edith Storey and Hughie Mack illustrate how good cooking and the art of make-up won the heart of an eccentric bachelor.

Mary Pickford at the Strand.

At the Strand theater, Mary Pickford is appearing in the title role of George Sand's "Fanchon the Cricket." The photoplay was produced by the Famous Players Film Co., and Miss Pickford has been given excellent support, including Jack Standing, Lottie Pickford, Gertrude Norman, Russell Bassett and Richard Lee. The Strand also offers a new Keystone Comedy; Travel and Scientific studies; and the Strand Topical Review, containing the latest International news and European war pictures. The musical program is also a varied and interesting one, the Concert Orchestra, under the direction of Carl Edouardo, rendering classical and popular selections. The vocal and instrumental soloists this week are newcomers to the Strand.

The Hippodrome Bill.

Holbrook Blinn and Alice Brady in a five-reel feature photoplay, made from Edward Sheldon's drama "The Boss," leads the program at the Hippodrome during the week commencing May 9. The Hippodrome Quintette, chorus and orchestra in a costume revival of ten of the most successful musical numbers from the spectacles given at this theater during the ten years of its existence; special daily news films, released by the Pharos Film Company, showing incidents in connection with the visit of the Atlantic fleet; the Mutual Weekly; the usual Charlie Chaplin comedy film; a new series of Living Pictures; selections by the Symphony Orchestra, and a new Water Spectacle, complete the bill.

"Little Sunset" at Broadway Theater.

"Little Sunset," a Bosworth release, on the Paramount program, is the feature picture of the Broadway theater bill for the week beginning May 9. The picture, a baseball story, is the work of Charles E. Van Loan, the best writer of tales of the Diamond in this country. Gordon Griffith, a six-year-old child actor, is the star of the comedy, which presents lifelike views of the Great American Game, members of the Venice team of the Pacific Coast League being utilized throughout the picture. Mr. Van Loan's humor is of the Three-Star brand, and he has sprinkled it plentifully into his story. Paramount South American Travel Scenes; Broadway Animated Weekly News, and Paula Edwards in a World Comedy Stars Film, "Something Just as Good," will also be shown during the week.

HORSLEY'S HAT OFF TO SELIG.

"Editor Moving Picture World,
"New York City, N. Y.

"Dear Sir:—With every intention of praise for me, the various trade papers have been issuing statements that it was through my efforts that the "wild animal" bill recently before the California legislature, was defeated.

"This is not so. While I gave every assistance possible toward the defeat of the measure, the real credit is due to Mr. Wm. Selig and his counsel, Frank Stobbs. I wish you would, in all justice to the untiring efforts of Mr. Selig, make this fact known to the readers of your most valuable publication. Very truly yours,

"DAVID HORSLEY."

"Los Angeles, April 29."

While the Moving Picture World printed no part of the press agent's piffle regarding the matter referred to in Mr. Horsley's letter, it is pleased to give space to Mr. Horsley's disclaimer and gracious acknowledgment of the services rendered by Mr. Selig in fighting injurious legislation.

Among Los Angeles Studios

Blaisdell Visits Kalem at Glendale and Meets Up With Many Other Picture Men and Women.

(By the Moving Picture World Staff Correspondent.)

Los Angeles, Cal.

COMING in from Hollywood last Sunday evening I had an excellent opportunity of noting the steady nerve of one of the screen girls who is known for doing hazardous things—the heroine of the "Hazards of Helen." Miss Holmes was at the wheel of a seven-seated car. Chatting all the while as if reclining in her own dressing room or parlor, the machine sped along twenty-five, thirty (let's see, we'll have to be careful we don't exceed the speed limit here), miles an hour, smoothly and evenly, turning corners as if guided by a skilled racing driver. Speaking about racing, it occurs to me I was told Miss Holmes only recently was barred from entering a local automobile contest. The committee would not permit a woman to compete.

It was an interesting half hour, that run over the boulevards, up hill and down, and through the city streets. Miss Holmes talked not of her present work, but of what she aimed to do in the future. She is looking forward to the time when she will have an opportunity to appear in straight drama—and perhaps even to wear gowns! There isn't a bit of doubt she will know how to wear them.

There had been a dinner party at the new home of Gene Gauntier, who has just finished her first Universal picture. Present were: Jack Clark, Miss Gauntier's director; Jack McGowan, Helen Holmes and Jane Wolfe. It was Easter Sunday and the conversation turned naturally to Jerusalem, where three years before three of those present had spent Easter while taking part in the portrayal of "From the Manger to the Cross." There were many reminiscences of the Holy Land, of Ireland and of Florida.

The next day Mr. McGowan sent in a car for the World man to come out and visit Kalem's Glendale studio. An ideal spot it is, surrounded on three sides by hills, with a big orange grove just across the way. It is here Director McGowan makes the interiors for the "Hazards of Helen" series, which has proved so popular with picturegoers that the numbers have been extended far beyond the original intention. On the other stage James Horne was putting on one of his two-part girl detective stories. Mr. Horne was busy, but he found time for a hearty handshake.

Here, too, we met for the second time William H. West, veteran Kalemite. We had several days before stopped Mr. West on a downtown street and made his acquaintance. Mr. West was awaiting the finish of his day's work that he might hurry home and prepare for the evening, when he was to retire from the chair of exalted ruler of Glendale Lodge, No. 1289, B. P. O. E. Mr. West has been an officer of the lodge since its organization with twenty-seven charter members two years and a half ago. The week before the exalted ruler had initiated the five hundredth member—and this in a town of 7,000 population. The old-time actor is enthusiastic over the natural beauties of the spot and of the town. Here, too, we met Marin Sais—and Cleo Ridgeley, who, too, was just visiting. The last time we had seen Miss Ridgeley was in front of Borough Hall, back in the old home town of Brooklyn, where, on horseback, she was just starting on her long journey across the continent. Another player we met was Mr. Williams of the railroad bunch. Mr. McGowan says with his company he can take out a full train—he has an engineer who was for thirty-eight years with the Chicago and Northwestern; he has a conductor, a brakeman and a fireman.

Last night in a downtown restaurant I met George Magie, the new Pacific Coast manager of the Universal. Mr. Magie has made three trips across the continent in the past month. With Mr. Magie were P. A. Powers and Mr. Fichtenberg, the New Orleans film man. When the new manager was asked if he intended to institute any changes in policy he said he did not. He intimated, however, that he had a keen realization of the importance of the story.

This same restaurant is a great gathering place for film folk. An Easterner easily might believe himself in New York as he looks around the big room. It was a week ago Sunday when as a guest of Travers Vail and Louise Vail of the Biograph Company I entered this restaurant following a ride and saw enough motion picture people to start a good-sized program.

At one table were the Universal pilgrims—Carl Laemmle, P. A. Powers, Harry Wolf and Mr. Fichtenberg. At another were H. P. Caulfield, a power in Universal City, and C. V. V. Henkel, one of the new sub-managers out in San Fernando Valley. William Robert, ("Bob") Daly and Fritze Brunette came in from Santa Barbara and immediately were surrounded by a host of friends. Mack Sennett was there, too; and Eddie Carewe, Jack Dillon, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Arling, George Beban, George Anderson, Fritzi Scheff, Marshal Neilan, Blanche Sweet, and many others.

But coming back to that ride, leave it to a director to know "locations" and to find beautiful spots. We started out at 2 o'clock under a lowering sky. Before we were out of the city we were in the first rain Los Angeles had seen in a month. It rained, too. But who, especially one under cover, would mind water when passing along Orange Grove avenue in Pasadena, said to be one of the show spots of the world. Well, it may be. Then a stop was made at the huge hotel, where were photographed many of the scenes in "The Americano," the Biograph release of March 30. The hostelry is situated in the center of a garden of ten acres. The rain had ceased before we started on to San Gabriel mission, where as the guest of Mr. McGroarty, the author of the mission play and the manager of the Mission theater, we saw the last act of this unusual drama—unusual because the playhouse is just across the highway from old San Gabriel, the five to eight-foot walls of which were built of stones brought by Indians from the distant mountains. On the stage was the representation of San Juan Capistrano Mission, like the old pile across the street. In looking at the one you were thinking of the other—and the story of the sufferings of the Indians seemed a relation of what was rather than of what has been.

The other day I took a run out to the big Reliance-Majestic studios, where, in the absence of D. W. Griffith, Frank E. Woods has charge of the ship. Mr. Woods was busy, but made time for a chat. There are something like fourteen or fifteen directors at work in the establishment where "The Clansman" was made. At the time nearly all were out in locations. Bennie Zeidman of the publicity department acted as pilot. We made a stiff hunt to find good Sheriff Mackley, but he was not present. We did meet Charles Clary, Ralph Lewis, who so finely played the unpopular role of Austin Stoneman in the big picture; Joseph Hennaberry, whose portrayal of Lincoln has brought fame to the young actor; Howard Gaye, the General Lee of "The Clansman"—and in the beardless face of the young man you can see the marked resemblance in physiognomy to the Southern leader; Mary Alden, who won laurels as Lydia Brown; Russell Smith of the scenario department, Eugene Pallette and Thomas Jefferson.

Lloyd Ingraham's kind offer of a ride in his new wagon to the Eclair studio was accepted—Los Angeles is a town of distances. The Eclair, or Features Ideal Company, had been in the city but a month. Manager Levy said that larger quarters were being sought. Three directors are now at work. We met old friends in two of these—Frank Beal and Carl M. Le Viness. The third, Webster Cullison, is a man with whom you feel acquainted on sight. He had been for fourteen months in Tucson, Ariz.; he must have imbibed some of the atmosphere in that time—certainly there was typical Western cordiality in his greeting. Out on the stage was Hal Wilson, long time Vitagrapher before he was an Eclair player and assistant director.

Ingraham drove me back to town. Really, it's a long story! Many ships pass in the night in this film man's town. It was getting late when we were pried apart.

Bumped into George Gebhardt the other day. He had just arrived in town. He seemed to have something up his sleeve.

The beautiful park known as the Selig Zoo is receiving the finishing touches. I was shown over the place by Mr. Robinson, who is on speaking terms with all the animals—big and little. What a lot of the big fellows there are, too! Out on the stages I met Tom Santschi and renewed acquaintance with Lamar Johnstone. Brother Wing, I regret to say, was away at the time, visiting the various studios with J. A. Berst.

It was to-day Meyer Cohen introduced me to H. L. ("Buck") Massie, special representative of the California Kriterion Film Exchange of San Francisco. Mr. Massie is a most entertaining talker and incidentally he knows the film business backward. He has been associated with many of the old-timers. In considering with him you feel you are in the presence of a real salesman—the sort of man who could sell fur overcoats on the lower reaches of the Amazon River and at the same time convince the natives that the turning over of the goods was above all a mark of the undying friendship of Massie. BLAISDELL.

Press Agent Runs Amuck

"Bob" Kane, of the Prohibition Film Company, Stands Sponsor for a Perfect "Whale of a Yarn."

"BOB" KANE, who seems to have found something very much alive to occupy his mind, not long ago sent out a "whale of a yarn" in exploitation of "Prohibition," the big feature picture being marketed by the Prohibition Film Corporation, of which Mr. Kane is the president. If the complete story is ever printed it is possible that there may be discovered some person who will forget the license of the press agent and believe it—but anyhow, it's a good story.

The yarn runs to the effect that Mr. Kane attended a number of meetings conducted by the Salvation Army in the tenement districts of New York, and personally addressing the congregations from the various pulpits, offered a prize of $100 for the best descriptive story of the picture, "Prohibition," written by a "down-and-outer." Afterwards, so the story goes, a special exhibition of the picture was given at 2 o'clock one morning (particular morning deponent sayeth not), in a Broadway theater (The particular Broadway theater deponent also sayeth not), for the purpose of allowing the down-and-outers in the contest to see what they were expected to write about. The $100 (real money, it is claimed) was given to a one-time Australian newspaper man (and, let it be remembered, Australia is a long distance from Broadway), who said that he would use the hundred to try once more to rehabilitate himself and, so the story goes.

Mr. Kane was so impressed with this ex-scribe's story, both of his own misfortunes and of the picture "Prohibition," that he, our own "Bob" Kane, added another hundred dollars (also in real money) to the original prize in order that the ex-scribe might make it two tries instead of one. (Easy with the whip, it's a tired horse.)

But for all of that, there is every reason to believe that Mr. Kane and his associates have made a ten-strike with "Prohibition." Bona-fide sales of important territories in the United States and Canada have already been reported and it is authoritatively stated that before another month has elapsed every foot of available territory will have been allotted at record prices.

MANAGER IRWIN ADVISES ADVANCE SALES.

A suggestion that points the way to increase box-office receipts comes from the Vitagraph-Lubin-Selig-Essanay, Inc. It is made in keeping with its policy of helping the exhibitors make more money, and while not a new idea in amusements, it is decidedly unique as applied to pictures. It advocates the advance sale of seats. In discussing the idea, General Manager Walter W. Irvin said:

"I believe where real merit exists, the matter of advance sales will hereafter be of just as great importance in the management of picture theaters as it is in the management of the theaters playing spoken dramas; in every locality there are sufficient numbers of people willing to pay an advance in price for the convenience of having their seat reserved for at least one exhibition during the evening. I think that this showing could begin at 7:30 or 8 o'clock and prices of the exhibitions before and after that time could be given at the regular admission charges."

NEW LOBBY DISPLAY.

The American Film Manufacturing Co. is supplying very attractive lobby display in form of 14x17 portraits of its various actors personally autographed by each respective player. A normal charge is being made.

Ethel Barrymore With Metro

America's Favorite Dramatic Star Included in the Important List of Players—To Appear in Rolfe Productions.

COMING on top of recent and important engagements already announced by Metro of prominent stars for their different producing companies, is the accession of another notable player in the person of Ethel Barrymore, a famous Charles Frohman star, who has been engaged to pose exclusively for the B. A. Rolfe Company. Miss Barrymore will begin shortly active work in a play yet to be announced.

Miss Barrymore has appeared before on the screen, but never so conspicuously as she will be picturized at the Rolfe studio. The new production is understood to be of so important a character, that it will enlist the combined services of two of the most experienced stage directors now working under the Rolfe banner in the persons of Mr. Middleton and J. W. Noble.

Miss Barrymore's debut in the movies was made in an intimate picturizing of her home life at her country place at Mamaroneck, N. Y., showing her play moments with her children. Her first real engagement for screen work was undertaken last summer on a play by Augusta Thomas called "The Nightingale."

Events in Miss Barrymore's life have always run in series of threes and, in fact, it may be said that this is also a family idiosyncrasy, since her grandmother had three children, her own mother had three children and she herself has three children. Therefore, may the conclusion be reached, that her engagement with the B. A. Rolfe Company, will be her last appearance in animated pictures?

Miss Barrymore has been in receipt of numerous offers to appear before the crank camera, but the hard work it has entailed upon her strength after a season of touring, has made her reluctant to even consider these offers. As her experiences last August during the taking of her first pictures, were, as she said at the time, "The hardest work I ever had to do." It required great inducements on the part of the Metro Pictures Corporation before Miss Barrymore could be prevailed upon to place her signature to a contract.

The success of Miss Barrymore as a screen subject is due much to her great stage reputation, but more particularly to her splendid appreciation of continuity, effective and incisive pantomime understanding of the requirements of the screen, combined with forceful and penetrative projection of her emotional and dramatic personality into the episodic situations as they are unfolded.

Miss Barrymore's activities during the past few years have revealed her as an actress of increased powers and of unusual emotional strength. In respect to being affected by her emotional roles to the extent of shedding real tears, she is not unlike the world's greatest emotional actress, namely, Sarah Bernhardt.

In the role of Berthe Tregnier in "The Shadow," by Niccodemi, a part written for the great French actress, Mme. Rejane, and which Miss Barrymore acted all of the past season, she was so affected by the scenes in which she appeared, that she cried at every performance.

"Are they real tears?" she was asked.

To which Miss Barrymore replied: "I'm afraid I cannot make you believe it You newspaper people don't believe anything is real. But they are real tears. I cry after the last act, but I weep after the second act, and weep until it seems I haven't any tears left."

Plays in which Miss Barrymore has been seen during the last few seasons are "Mid-Channel," by Pinero in 1910; "Alice-Sit-by-the-Fire," and "The Witness for the Defense" in 1911, followed by engagements in vaudeville in a playlet entitled "Drifting," and last season in "Tante," by Haddon Chambers, and a short engagement with John Drew at the Empire theater, New York, in "A Scrap of Paper."

"FLYING A" RODEO.

The cowboys are all astir about the coming Rodeo which will be put on at the race track under the management of the "Flying A." Ten events are on the program, which promises to be even better than last year. Besides broncho busting and steer riding there will be Roman, hippodrome, chariot, relay and broncho races. Harry Gant, a champion relay racer, will race Frank Nicely and Karl Norrison, all of the "Flying A" studios. Morrison was out on the track brushing up on the Roman race; his horses had a difference, one running away and the other staying behind. It looked as though he was going to be torn limb from limb, but he escaped with only a "skinning."

Doings at Los Angeles.

THOMAS H. INCE, who was severely injured when his car turned over while he was speeding along the Santa Monica race course, is recovering rapidly, and will be back at work in a short time. He suffered a double broken collar bone, minor scratches and bruises, and at first it was thought he had internal injuries, but this, fortunately, was not the case.

Wallace Reid, driving his big machine along one of the downtown streets, collided with a jitney bus, and in the wreck, one of the passengers in the small machine suffered injuries from which he died the next day. Two other men were seriously injured. Mr. Reid was held all of one night in jail, and bailed out the next day, and then released later on his own recognizance. The coroner returned a verdict of death unavoidable, but the district attorney rearrested Mr. Reid, and charged him with manslaughter. The outcome is yet to be seen, but it is probable that the case will be dismissed.

Danny Sullivan, assistant director to J. Farrell MacDonald, of the Biograph, is rejoicing this week because of his return from the velley of the shadow of death. While making hazardous scenes up the coast, on the rocks, the camera was set on a rugged volcano, and the action started with the director near the camera and Danny nearby. Somehow the latter fell into the water, was sucked into a big whirlpool and had sunk down for the second time before he was rescued. The camera caught it all. It required about an hour to resuscitate the half-drowned assistant.

The Kalem in Glendale is being renovated again, or rather improved. James Horne, directing the girl detective serial, has ordered a new stage built. It will have roof and sides of glass and be equipped with electric lights. This looks like permanency. J. P. McGowan is going to have a siding built from the S. P. R. R. to the glass studio so that they can make Helen pictures while the rain falls.

Ford I. Beebe, publicity expert at the Universal, is in bed with pneumonia. Nearly every company was working under the glass roof this week while the rain poured outside. Francis Ford had a real big desert scene on this stage one day, taking up nearly the whole space, it was a good set, too.

Already the big plot of land which he leased is beginning to look like a real modern studio. His "pie" stage is laid out and the animal runway built. The stages and buildings are fast going up. Milton H. Fahrney has been engaged by Mr. Horsley to direct his big productions and he is already on the ground busily engaged in superintending things. The players and employees will soon be engaged and then another great plant will have been added to the picture capital.

Since returning to the coast Mr. Jesse L. Lasky reports that Geraldine Farrar will arrive here June 15 on a special train, with another train of servants. Already a bungalow has been leased for her and everything made ready for her arrival. A special dressing room is to be built, just for her, and equipped with every modern convenience. The story in which she will appear is being written by Mr. C. De Mille, and will be produced by Cecil B. De Mille. Laura Hope Crewes has arrived and is working in "Fighting Hope."

Many actors and actresses can handle foils, but when it comes down to a real fight with the sharp points, Augusta Anderson, leading lady with the Biograph, showed some class. Last week she had a duel with Charles Perley in "The Master of the Sword." George Rheem, her director, asked if she could use the foils and not be afraid to go at it in earnest. She was glad to accept the task, and before the camera stopped turning Mr. Rheem was shouting to her to be careful and not injure Mr. Perley.

That vaudeville has nothing on pictures was demonstrated some days ago when three stars of filmland, Charles Chaplin, G. M. Anderson, and Roscoe Arbuckle were sitting in a box at the Empress theater. The manager of the house spotted them and requested them to take the stage, which they did, after much applause by the house. What's more, they kept their places for 40 minutes, talking, while the show was held up.

Here is a pickup from a letter received by Editor Del Ruth, of the Keystone. "I have heard nothing from you or of you since I met you in Delhi while you were making a tour of India just after leaving college. Last week I saw a comedy issued under the Keystone brand in which a little incident that occurred to us on that memorable evening in the bungalow of the gentleman from Bombay, was used. Either you wrote the story or it is a remarkable coincidence. If you ever receive this let me know, as I am much interested." Del Ruth answered the letter, which was from the friend whom he had not seen for ten years. The story was based upon the facts related.

When Henry Otto went to Point Conception to film scenes for "The Guiding Light," he certainly did film a few good ones, the best being a real night scene of the flaring searchlight at the lone light house, on the rock point. The annual wild west show and rodeo will be held this year on Sunday, May 16, at Inceville. It would have been held earlier, but, on account of the big Fiesta Rodeo in Los Angeles early in the month, it was delayed. At this big event every puncher and, in fact, every member of Ince's forces will be present and take part. Special cars and trains will be run to and from the canyon studios where the events will take place on "the flats" or mesas, overlooking the broad Pacific. Tons of fresh beef will be barbecued and given to the guests. Everyone in the southland is invited, admission is free, and a good time will be given every visitor. Many tourists and summer visitors will be present. The rodeo this year will be a record breaker, sure.

A stag dinner party was given by Douglas Gerrard to Allan Dwan, head director of the Famous Players Company, in the English-room at the Los Angeles Athletic Club, on the eve of his wedding to Miss Pauline Bush. Mr. Gerrard was voted toastmaster, and the occasion passed off delightfully. Speeches were made by Carlyle Blackwell, Murdock McQuarrie and Douglas Gerrard; songs were sung by Donald Crisp, Al Kauffman and Owen Moore, and recitations rendered by Robert Herron, Jack Pickford and David Kirkland. Harry Ham and Ted Hamerer contributed some card tricks and Wallace Reid played selections on his violin. Then the toastmaster rang up Miss Bush, and she listened to the toast in her honor. Al Kauffman entertained the party at the theater and at Levy's after the dinner.

CLARKE IRVINE.

Rooney and Bent with Lubin.

PAT ROONEY, Marion Bent and their clever young son, Pat Rooney, Jr., three of the most popular vaudevillians on the stage to-day, are featured in the Lubin comedy, "The Busy Bell Boy," released Saturday, May 8th. This is the first time these inimitable dancers and funsters have ever appeared on the screen and their mannerisms, which are quite in a class by themselves, are refreshingly different at a time when so many comedy photoplays are usually mere imitations.

Rooney plays the part of Fidgie, a soda clerk, and he sticks to his job until he meets Marion and her mother. It is love at first sight. With a leap over the counter he follows them to their hotel where he gets a job as a bell boy. Marion has a titled suitor, and Fidgie, wearing the evening clothes of a guest, exposes him as a fakir. Incidentally, he is the star at a hotel dansant with Marion as his partner. Fidgie's dream of bliss comes to an abrupt end when the angry guests discover he is merely a bell boy. An amusing chase follows, in which Fidgie and Marion outdistance their pursuers and elope. Mr Rooney's irrepressible spirits and remarkable agility make this photoplay very entertaining, and Bent's conception of the modern dances, as illustrated in the dansant scene, is unique. Others in the cast are Clara E Lambert, Gilbert Ely and George Trimble

Among the Picture Theaters

News and Views of Photoplay Houses Everywhere

CLEMMER THEATER, SPOKANE, WASH.

Dr. Clemmer Opens Handsome Picture House—Has 1,000 Seating Capacity—Entertained 7,500 on Opening Day.

THE new Clemmer theater, Spokane, Wash., built by August Paulsen, a millionaire mining man, and leased by Dr. H. S. Clemmer, who also operates the Casino theater, was opened Monday, February 22, and the attendance for the first day was estimated at 7,500. It was opened with Mary Pickford in "Mistress Nell." This moving picture house, which is a palace of beauty and is artistically decorated, has a seating capacity of approximately 1,000. Aside from the theater the building has storerooms on the ground floor around the outside of the auditorium and there are offices in front on the second and third floors, where the space is not taken for the balcony.

The main entrance is on Sprague avenue, through three pair of doors, opening to a lobby 24 feet wide. The lighting of the vestibuled rotunda is a distinct novelty. The effect is secured by concealed trough lighting, with a large cluster of lights in the center of the domed ceiling. The floor is tiled in mosaic pattern, and the wainscoting is of marble. The box office is at one corner. The rotunda opens directly on the foyer, 16 feet wide, which gives access to the four wide aisles of the main floor. Catching the eye by the richness of its design and the easy flowing lines, upon entering the foyer, is the sweeping incline that leads to the balcony. The balustrade is surmounted by a fumed oak banister, and on top of this is a dull brass rail. By three easy slopes the incline terminates in the center of the balcony, overlooking the dress circle. Across the front of the balcony are eight boxes, of eight chairs each. These chairs are features of the theater, and were made in Austria just before the war broke out. They are of simple, stately design, of Austrian bent oak, finished in French grey, and upholstered in mulberry velour. The seats of the theater, outside the boxes, are of uniform type; they are roomy and are upholstered in leather. The theater seats approximately 1,000 persons. The chairs are 33 inches from back to back, and are of the latest design, manufactured in 20, 21 and 22-inch sizes. On the mezzanine floor, half way up the incline to the balcony, is the women's retiring room, 12 feet by 35 feet. It is lighted by windows facing Lincoln street. It is furnished with numerous handsome pieces of Louis XIV. design, with a soft blue Wilton rug, harmonizing with the French gray of the walls and the ultramarine of the ceiling. The luxurious draperies in this room are of figured net and cretonne. A telephone desk and a davenport, upholstered in blue, are features of the furnishings. The lighting is by alabaster urns, with old ivory trimmings. The smoking room for men is in the basement, and is of simple design. It is reached by a staircase from the foyer. An usher's rest room is another feature, and is equipped with shower baths. The operating room is at the rear of the balcony and is well lighted from the Lincoln street windows. It is equipped with two of the latest Simplex motor-driven projection machines, a stereopticon also is operated by motor.

The main auditorium slopes gently. The building is without a visible post downstairs or in the balcony. The general lines are simple and dignified, and the detail being classic. Exits are numerous. From the balcony two wide exit stairs lead direct to Lincoln street, that persons leaving the balcony will not in any way interfere with those entering. The same condition applies to the main floor. Patrons leave this floor through an inclined passage to Sprague avenue, and also by an inclined passage to Lincoln street. Especial care has been taken in these features to avoid the confusion and congestion caused by patrons leaving and entering the theater simultaneously. The general color scheme of the interior is one of taste and softness, the predominating tones being French Gray, gold, ultramarine and mulberry. The curtains and hangings on the stage are of mulberry velour, embellished with gold, and the draperies across the back of the theater on the foyer are of the same material. An unusual effect has been achieved by E. W. Houghton in the coffered sounding board, extending back from the proscenium arch. This is a fretwork of panels, perforations and caissons. It is finished in French gray, blue and purple, touched up with old gold. It is suspended by wires, concealed, and in itself gives an elaborate architectural effect. It conceals the organ loft. The entire organ is concealed except the keyboard. Across the top of the proscenium arch the same fretwork arrangement is in evidence, the whole making an unusual pattern, somewhat resembling a mosaic. The loft of the echo organ is ingeniously concealed at the rear of the balcony.

I. Peterson did the mural decoration of the new Clemmer. The coved or barrel ceiling, over the balcony, is done in ultramarine. The decorative plaster is in oils with a background of silver, bronze and leaf work of light blue and purple. The frieze is a conventional landscape design, with a blue sky and greens and purple. The foyer ceiling is sky blue, and the wall panels contain conventional landscapes in greens, purple and light blues. The wainscoting in all parts of the theater is of marble, seven feet six inches high. Wilton carpets are used in the aisles, and cork tiling on the inclines and in the foyer. The electric machinery used in the Clemmer is of the latest type and includes curtain motor, vacuum cleaning system, ventilating system, pumps and generators. The exterior lighting of the building is done by eleven 1,000-Watt nitrogen lamps. The principal ceiling fixtures are of the indirect type. There are approximately 1,000 incandescent lamps to light the auditorium and the stage. Thermostats in the main auditorium keep absolute tab on the temperature, and operate automatically to give more heat when the mercury drops below 65 degrees and to cool the auditorium if it becomes too warm.

The stage is equipped with two spacious dressing rooms for the soloists. All the floors are of concrete, and the doors are metallic, making the structure as fireproof as possible. The building itself is of steel and concrete, with a steel frame, and concrete floors and roof slabs. It is faced with matt glazed brick and matt glazed terra cotta trimmings of the street fronts. Both the brick and terra cotta are of warm buff shades.

FIELDING WANTS LEADING WOMAN.

Romaine Fielding, Lubin actor-producer, recently visited Los Angeles in search of a leading woman for his company in Phoenix, Ariz. He is finishing "A Western Governor's Humanity," in which he used the capitol building, state official, and the governor himself. The story is a corking good one and is full of atmosphere and new ideas in picturization. Recently at the opening of the Roosevelt dam at Tonto, the bishop who was to have pronounced the invocation was absent on account of delay, so the chairman of the committee, turning to the well-known and well-liked director, asked him to give the prayer. Mr. Fielding did, and he said that it so affected him that he almost cried.

OCOEE THEATER, CLEVELAND, TENN.

Built in Harmony With Its Art—Has Many Features—Uses Wurlitzer Orchestrion.

IT IS regrettable that so few buildings devoted to amusement in this country are architecturally designed in harmony with their purpose. Even theaters devoted to high class musical or dramatic productions may be found buried in the center of a business block or the heart of a skyscraper with no hint of their existence except a brilliantly lighted entrance. As for moving picture places, many of them still occupy reconstructed stores originally designed purely for business purposes. When the purveyors of amusement in America universally use buildings architecturally harmonious with the art involved then we shall the more nearly approach the city beautiful.

In the construction of the Ocoee Theater at Cleveland, Tenn., this consistent idea of the fitness of things has been evolved rather strikingly and for that the people of Cleveland have J. Hardie Johnston, owner and manager of the Ocoee, to thank. Mr. Johnston first came into prominence as a picture theater manager in Cleveland by constructing a theater in the Fillauer building which he named the Moneta. This place was in a business block and it did not suit his artistic fancy, so he purchased a vacant lot in the heart of the city and built the Ocoee according to his own idea as to what a theater building should be. The result is an artistic piece of architecture and a substantial ornament to the town. The Ocoee is a theater and nothing but a theater. Figuratively speaking, even a blind man could see that it is exclusively devoted to the art of moving picture entertainment.

Construction of the Ocoee theater began in March, 1914, and the place was opened, with a fashionable attendance that packed the house, on June 1 of the same year. The front of the theater is highly ornamental, having a lobby 24x16, with a Mosaic floor and a decorated ceiling. The lobby walls are embellished with figures in bas-relief and tastefully tinted.

The color scheme of the interior of the Ocoee is a soft tan, relieved by touches of ultra-marine and crimson. Pictures in large panels on the walls and ceiling include fanciful designs of a character appropriate to the amusement business, while, for diversity, there are a number of landscape scenes excellently done. The house is freely ventilated through two windows at the rear, three in front and six on the sides, supplemented by a battery of high power electric fans.

The stage, which is 28x24 feet, making it sufficiently large for vaudeville acts, the length of the theater is 105 feet, and its width is 28 feet. This width permits of two aisles, wide enough for the passage of two people abreast, and still leave room for five seats in the center tier and three seats on each side of the middle tier. Seating capacity including balcony, 250 seats. Two 6-A Power's machines are used, the throw being 96 feet. A $1,500 Wurlitzer orchestra piano furnishes the music. Licensed pictures are used.

The Ocoee has a couple of features not often found in moving picture places in that part of the country. They are, first, an automatic ticket seller and second a check system for the apparel and other personal belongings of patrons. These have served to make the Ocoee a distinctly notable and successful place of entertainment. The Ocoee represents an investment of $6,500. Ten cents is the admission price.

Cleveland is thirty miles north of Chattanooga on the Southern Railway. Two other important towns between Chattanooga and Knoxville are Athens and Sweetwater. Mr. Johnston controls the Alhambra theater at Athens and is constructing another artistic moving picture place in Sweetwater to be known as the Moneta. He is a successful theater manager and a personally popular gentleman.

PIEDMONT THEATRE, GREENSBORO, N. C.

New Picture House Opened Last November Represents an Investment of $100,000.—Has 114 Foot Throw.

THE Piedmont Amusement Company of Greensboro, N. C., owners and managers of eight theaters, added another picture house to their growing list of theaters by opening the Piedmont at Greensboro. The company has theaters in Charlotte, N. C., Lynchburg, Va., Danville, Va., Winston-Salem, N. C., Columbia, S. C., Durham, N. C., and another in Greensboro besides the one which was recently opened. The name of the new structure is the Piedmont, and it involved an outlay of $100,000 to erect. It is reputed as being one of the most beautiful picture houses in the South. The entire facade is beautifuliy illuminated with a large number of incandescent lights. The ornamental pilasters and windows have been outlined in lights and the two big globes which stand at both ends of the roof add to the refulgency of the exterior. The name Piedmont has been done in big letters of electric lights and extends across the upper part of the house, near the roof. The lobby is also handsomely lighted and decorated. The ceiling of this part of the house is very high, as can be seen from the accompanying photo of the exterior. The walls are wains-coted with marble to a height of about 10 feet. A border of an artistic plaster design containing electric lights, surmounts the marble wainscoting. The box office is made of marble and above this is the manager's office. On that part of the lobby walls above the wainscoting and extending to the ceiling, are artistic pilasters which break the monotony of plainness and accentuate the decorative appearance of the entrance.

Piedmont Theater, Greensboro, N. C.

The interior of the Piedmont further attests to the truthfulness of the assertion that the house is one of the best picture houses in the South. There is a capacious foyer well illuminated. The indirect lighting system is employed throughout. The tints and tones of the interior decorations blend harmoniously together, resulting in a color scheme most pleasing and restful to the eye. The balcony is swung on the cantilever process, and the loges instead of extending across the front of the balcony, have been placed at different levels at each side of the auditorium, and connect with the balcony proper. The photograph of the interior shows how the 800 seating capacity of the Piedmont has been arranged. It will be observed that there is nothing to obstruct the sight lines of any seat in the house, and a picture that is devoid of distortion can be had from any place in the seating plan. The fireproof operating room is at the back of the balcony, and has among its up-to-date equipment two Power's 6A projection machines. Direct current is produced by means of a motor generator. The throw is 114 feet and the size of the picture is 14 by 15 feet. The lavatories for women and men are spacious and contain the latest appointments. No money was spared to give the public an institution which is compatible with the progress of picture theater evolution, and the resultant effect is that the Piedmont is doing a business which is eclipsing the anticipations of the most optimistic member of the Piedmont Amusement Company.

The stage is as pretty and as attractive as any other part of the house. It is fashioned to represent a romantic garden scene. In front of the screen, which has been outlined in a black border, is a fountain sending forth its multicolored streams. The basin of the fountain has been encircled with flowers and a narrow walk, running around the fountain and leading to the footlights, heighten the effect of reality. A miniature hedge runs the entire width of the stage. At each end of the stage is trellis work marking off the garden. This lattice work is supported by four posts, each one of which is mounted by a frosted globe, which enhances the effect. Ivy climbs up the trellis work. Scenery painted to represent a woodland is used as a background for the trellis work. Expensive and heavy draperies are hung over the stage and altogether the impression created by the setting is pleasing and lasting.

The musical program is furnished by a six-piece orchestra, and a Wurlitzer organ. The admission prices are 10 and 15 cents. W. R. Wilkerson, besides being the manager of the Piedmont, is also the general booking agent for the Piedmont Amusement Company, duties which keep him on the go all the time.

KNICKERBOCKER THEATER, DETROIT, MICH.

Ingersoll and Gaukler, Two Experienced Amusement Men, Give Detroiters a Splendid Picture Theater.

THE KNICKERBOCKER, Detroit's latest picture theater, and one of the most elaborate devoted exclusively to the presentation of motion pictures, embodies the most modern arrangements and comforts for its patrons which can be devised. Months of careful thought and study were devoted by the owners and their architects to producing a house which would fulfill all the requirements demanded by the highest class of productions and of patronage. The result of their efforts can only be fully realized by a visit to this beautiful house. The structure is situated at Jefferson avenue and Belle Isle Bridge approach, and was opened in the early part of April. The exterior with its ornate facade and beautiful colorings typifies at once its character. Cream terra cotta and rich, warm, brown brick with a green tile roof and heavy overhanging marquise give it at once the feeling of comfort and pleasure to be found within. Lighting effects of a novel arrangement give its appearance at night the same enticing effect. No staring lights are visible, the whole front being suffused with a clear and even light, giving the effect of a distant spot light throwing its powerful rays over the entire surface. Monster glass globes encased in iron bands enclosing flaming arcs are placed at both corners at the top, further adding to the glow about the building.

The entire front of the lower story is given over to the lobby and stair halls, these stair halls leading to the balcony of the auditorium and to the offices of the company on the floors above the lobby. The lobby walls are wainscoted to a height of ten feet with Grecian Skyros marble with a black and gold marble base, the ceiling is vaulted in buff tiles and the floor is of imported red quarry tile laid with heavy yellow joints. The ticket office, set partly in the lobby and partly out of doors, is of copper and marble, and so designed as to face the street in summer and the lobby in winter. Antique semi-indirect lighting fixtures flood the lobby with a soft, warm brilliancy. The whole room in yellow and red has a richness and warmth which further enhances the feeling of coziness and comfort produced by the exterior.

The auditorium, with its balcony, seating a thousand persons, still further accentuates the intentions of comfort with the added feeling of roominess. The aisles are wide, and the seats, with full spring seats and backs of leather, are all of extra width, and the spacing between is of such a depth as to avoid the almost universal inconvenience caused by persons passing in and out. The balcony, seating two hundred and sixty, has been specially designed for higher class patronage. Easy-going staircases, comfortable seating arangements and spacious loges along the entire front, all with most excellent sight lines, make this balcony a most desirable part of the house. All seats here are to be reserved and can be reserved in advance, one of the many features of the house which the owners have devised for furthering the accommodation and comfort of their patrons.

The picture screen is set well back on the stage, which occupies the rear of the lot, and is so far removed from the front row of seats that every seat in the house commands a comfortable view of the picture. At the stage end of the auditorium are two singer's balconies and in the orchestra pit is placed a large and beautiful combination organ. The house is heated in winter and cooled in summer by a thorough ventilating and temperature controlling system. The air is forced into the auditorium by fans and the foul air exhausted by large ventilators in the ceiling above. Supplementing this forced supply of pure air a novel system of exhaust has been devised by the architects so that preceding the opening of the house or between shows the room may be warmed or cooled or the entire house cleared of all foul air in less than a minute.

The lighting of the auditorium is done by the installation of semi-indirect fixtures, diffusing a soft and mellow light which keeps the house at all times in light, thus doing away entirely with side brackets and aisle lights. The walls and ceilings are in panel treatment. The ceiling is coved and the side walls are finished around their entire top with tapestry panels depicting mythological scenes. The color scheme is in a warm, pleasing green, old ivory and gold. Over the entire floor of the auditorium is a cork composition carpet, making the whole floor noiseless, sanitary and comfortable to the feet. Drinking fountains with sanitary cups are placed on both the ground floor and the balcony, giving cool spring water at all times. Comfortable toilet facilities are arranged in the basement for both women and men patrons.

The owner of this new enterprise is the Knickerbocker Amusement Company, of which Frederick Ingersoll and Francis O. Gaukler, long known to the amusement-loving public of the entire country, are the principal stockholders.

OBSERVATIONS

BY OUR MAN ABOUT TOWN.

THE tribute paid to the memory of the late John H. Bunny as his body rested at the Elks' Club House last week was one of the most impressive and beautiful ever accorded any actor of the past or present generations. It has gone far towards convincing people that the claims for recognition by the motion picture people as legitimate members of the amusement world are fully justified. The funeral service brought together the most prominent and influential people of both stage and studio. The assemblage set at rest for all time the question as to whether the players of the studios were mere upshoots lacking the standing and dignity of the stage players. Among the attendants were David Belasco and Charles Frohman, who are in the lead among the producers connected with the legitimate stage. Ten years ago both these gentlemen would probably have given announcement of Mr. Bunny's death no more than passing notice. At about that time Mr. Bunny was an ordinary member of the theatrical profession. His personality was such that he was adapted to a limited line of roles, of which few gave him much prominence. When he decided to abandon the legitimate stage and take up motion picture parts the transition attracted little, if any, attention on the part of the legitimate managers and players. If they paid any attention to it they were exceedingly brief in comment. A member of the legitimate profession stated at the funeral services, "Most of us thought when John Bunny took up picture work that he was doing a wise thing because his sphere on the stage was necessarily a limited one, but none of us ever dreamed that he would attain a position in the amusement world so far outclassing even the most successful players of the stage he abandoned. None of us doubted that he would be successful. We all said his face would be his fortune in pictures. At the same time none of us believed that the pictures would permit him to advance to the position he held at the time of his death. It is a great pity that after years of hard work he should not have been enabled to retire and spend a few years in enjoyment of his well earned fortune."

The death of Mr. Bunny has occasioned many expressions of condolence by the national and international newspapers and, although all his work was done in this country, the newspapers of Great Britain and the Continent are devoting as much space to editorial comment as the home papers. These bespeak the great circulation the American-made motion pictures have attained. It is almost unbelievable that a motion picture actor's death should have attracted attention exceeding that given such great members of the legitimate theatrical profession as Forrest, Booth, Barrett, McCullough and the world-renowned Charlotte Cushman. Mr. Bunny made but one trip abroad, and that did not exceed a period of over four months. In that time his personal appearances could not have made the impression to call forth the notices the foreign papers are according his death. Through personal contact Mr. Bunny was as little known on "the other side" as he was on "this side" before the tour of this country he completed shortly before he died. He reached the people through the pictures and the impression made by his "Ha! Ha!" face will not pass away soon.

But of all the newspaper comments published on Mr. Bunny's passing away none has spoken of more than his career as a comedian. All have referred only to the cheerfulness his face has carried to the people. Lack of personal acquaintance has kept from the writer's knowledge of the fact that he was one of the very few people of the theatrical profession endowed with that acumen which enables one to launch a business proposition and handle it with success. He was by no means a clownish comedian. His grimaces and grotesque actions before the camera opened the way to fortune, but his sound business judgment enabled him to hold and add to that fortune. And yet none charged him with still owning the first dollar he ever made. His advice was frequently sought by many in the profession. He gave it frankly and with all the sincerity of a friend. Not only was he generous in this respect. Few appealed to him for influence or financial aid and left disappointed.

A personal friend of Mr. Bunny, however, says that he was keen in his philanthropy as he was in his business dealings. After he had attained his popularity in the motion picture business and had struck the high road to success he was importuned daily by people who had formerly been associated with him on the legitimate stage. One day he was called upon by a member of the profession who said "John, don't you know me? Don't you remember, I was with you on the coast about twenty years ago? You surely have not forgotten." To this Mr. Bunny replied: "If I have you are trying hard to make me forget my forgetfulness. But what is the big idea? Who are you, and what do you want. I'm busy." The visitor explained all and closed with a substantial "touch," whereupon Mr. Bunny said "I may have been with you on the coast. If I was it has escaped my memory. One thing is indelibly impressed upon my mind when you speak of the coast. When I was in Frisco about twenty years ago as a member of a theatrical company and making much less money than I am getting now I found myself very much in need of a loan and failed to get it. Now that I have money I find every man, woman and child I ever met on the road trailing my footsteps for a lift. Here is a bill. Take it and put it to good use. Do not look upon it as an installment. I am entitled to what I have earned and will give only within reason, and to those who really need it. Andrew Carnegie may build all the libraries he wishes, but I am going to hold on to my umbrella and look out for a rainy day."

There is a false impression abroad that Mr. Bunny gave up motion picture work because he felt his usefulness in it had waned. The fact is that his continued work for several years had created a desire for a temporary change of environment and at about the same time flattering offers were made to him for a tour of this country, to be followed by one of the world. These appealed to him and he finally entered into negotiations for the tour. He had several objects in view. He would combine business with pleasure. If his health permitted, upon the completion of the tours, he would re-enter picture work. If it did not, the money derived from the contracts with what he had already made would enable him to retire to private life. It is deplorable that two unexpected events suddenly crushed the brightest outlook of his life. The outbreak of the European war suspended the world's tour. His physical breakdown cut the home tour short. It is generally believed that the failure to realize what he had so enthusiastically planned last summer created a disappointment that worked materially against his chances for recovery. It is the opinion of his most intimate friends that his ailments were of such a character that he would not have been able to undertake the world tour. Those most observing say they believe Mr. Bunny realized this during the closing weeks of the engagement. He was not an emotional man and was seldom moved to tears on impressive occasions, but he broke down completely one night when addressing an audience at the Broadway theater in Brooklyn. Among other things, he said: "I thank you all with all my heart and wish to say that this will be the last time I will appear on the stage in Brooklyn unless it be on the screen." The version that Mr. Bunny had become discouraged by losses he incurred through the tour is apparently without foundation. Personally, he sustained no financial loss, being under contract and fully protected. While the company was billed under his name and as his own, the financial end was sustained by others. His close friends say that if there was any disappointment it was due to his health alone. One of them suggested that he rest his body and mind and give up thoughts of the screen, but he said that if his health permitted he could not remain idle. But with road work I am through, I can't troupe any more."

A local newspaper says editorially it is a fact of suggestive interest that the moving picture theatre managers make no complaint of competition by cabarets, although the regular theatrical managers are loud in their protests against the inroads the cabaret has made on the box office receipts of the "regular" drama. Of course, the moving picture people have no complaint. The seat of the "regular" drama has been transferred to the motion picture house.

In the struggle to stem the overwhelming success of the motion picture, managers are now arranging to reproduce some of them on the regular stage. The first experiment is to be a copy of Charlie Chaplin's work. This would seem to indicate that the once despised "canned play" has absorbed the playwrights of the stage world.

Advertising for Exhibitors

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

Four Copies and yet—

THINK of a house getting four copies of The Moving Picture World, and yet not being able to find out about films. But read this letter from J. E. Tompkins, of the Princess theater, Colorado Springs:

> We get so much good out of the World (we get four copies per week at this house), and find so many valuable tips in the department, that we are sending a few samples of the programs we have published and we will welcome any comment you care to make.
> The various styles were the result of experiments to best accommodate the program to the service; you will note we formerly changed pictures thrice weekly but now change daily.
> We find the vest pocket size apparently shows the best returns. We show two weeks bookings in each issue and re-print every ten days. We find about 85 per cent. of the programs distributed in the house "stick" and we use them in various ways outside.
> We have great faith in the 25 to 40 word text matter following the announcement of title and star, which we try to keep thoroughly consistent and truthful as possible. However, we sometimes find it difficult to get the information necessary to do this.
> Often a meaningless title, such as, for instance, "Pretty Mrs. Smith," is as much of an enigma to us as to the average patron who has not seen the original play. As a great deal of our film is "first run" and the press stuff is frequently just a few days in advance of the date, we have to depend upon the advance notes in the World in many cases.
> We are anxiously awaiting any suggestions you may make to improve the sheet, and will say that we can see several points which might be improved. We are having an artist design a title page, and we have ordered better stock.
> No doubt we could have produced a much better sheet had we followed your advice and asked some of our brother-exhibitors for samples, but we, like so many others, persist in the unpardonable sin of neglecting to allot suffcient of our time to our ad work. We would be glad to exchange with any of the brothers who wish to do so.
> The little green card herewith is part of a stunt which we believe will interest you.
> About this time we learned we had "Gretna Green" booked for St. Patrick's Day, we learned, also, that our numerous Irish friends intended to celebrate the same evening with almost everything dear to the Irish heart, from a wedding to a wake, not, excepting the benefit "Irish Minstrels" at that famous palace of beauty, the Burns theater.
> It was up to us to "do something Irish," and to make them come to the matinee. We had no idea what the plot of the play was like, but knew anything with as much green in it must be Irish. Accordingly, we billed it "In four Irish reels," and prevailed on our good friends at the big church to see that the cards were distributed among the worshippers as they were leaving the church after mass on the Sunday preceding St. Patrick's Day. And we had SOME matinee.

Mr. Tompkins' ideas on advertising are sound. Most of the exhibitors who have tried both forms have found that the vest pocket is the best, save where they can get out an elaborate and really readable booklet. We also hold with the theory that a brief reader following the title is better than display work, but it must be about the film and not the story of the film. Here, too, Mr. Tompkins travels with us. But we cannot understand how an exhibitor with even one subscription to this paper can be in doubt about the films if he is willing to take the slight trouble involved by the keeping of a card index for titles and dates. Before a picture is released the synopsis is printed. Given the release date, a reference to the files of approximate date will locate the story. If they wish information as to Paramount they will find the Paramount people more than willing to give all the information needed. It is the same with practically all companies. Mutual and Universal have their house organs and the various licensed men their bulletins. All that is required is a note on a letter head. "Please put me on your mailing list," and it is there, though the most compact form is this paper, since it contains ALL of the information about ALL of the companies, including the film story and comment.

The Princess used a four pager, 5 by 6½, but changed to a four-page card vest pocket three by five. The old form was dated on the front cover. The new form should be. It is not done at present, though they date each day. But the day should be dated and "Week of —" should be used on the cover for ready identification. For front page copy they use Ralph Ruffner's "So-U-Ma-No" and some set house talk. This saves composition, but it would be better to vary the talk each week. The change in style was made when the shift to a daily program change was inaugurated. Since the change the sub-paragraphs have lost much of their former value. They are too vague and general.

Of course they "did a flop" on Gretna Green, which is in Scotland not Ireland, but mistakes will happen now and then. But the card was well done with a shamrock and horseshoe cut, two shades of green for ink and stock and even "Four (Irish) Reels."

One new—and good—stunt is a trip to the fair. Votes are given with each ten cent purchase by a number of prominent stores and at the matinees. The largest number of votes is good for a trip to San Francisco. By letting the stores in on the proposition, they share the benefit and at the same time the scheme is given wider publicity and more general interest, since the votes pile up more quickly.

Another unusual scheme was framed to help the campaign for Sunday opening. The four picture houses combined to fight the proposition of closing and this proposition was made:

> The question of allowing motion picture theaters to remain open on Sunday will be voted on at the next city election, April 6th. The great majority of the voters are in favor of this measure, and there is no doubt that it will be carried if there is a full vote on the proposition. All that is asked by those in charge of the campaign to permit motion picture theaters to remain open on Sunday is that every voter cast his ballot on the proposed ordinance, and that the question be not determined by a minority vote. The only way in which a full vote can be brought out is by personal work among your neighbors. In order to secure your co-operation in this, the four motion picture theaters of the city make the following proposition:
> To the person in each of the 29 voting precincts of the city, who secures the largest number of signatures of those in his precinct who will signify their intention to vote for the proposed ordinance, will be given a year's pass (good for two) on either The Princess, The Empress, The Odeon or The Opera House (moving picture shows only), good from April 10, 1915, to April 10, 1916.
> To the person among the 29 winners whose precinct makes the best proportionate showing for the ordinance on election day will be given a pass (good for two) on ALL FOUR of these theaters from April 10, 1915, to April 10, 1916.
> Signatures must be secured on official blanks which may be procured from A. R. Gardner, McRae Cafe Building, 105 E. Pike's Peak avenue, from whom full information may be secured.
> The proposed Sunday amusement ordinance provides only for wholesome recreation. There is no loop-hole through which any objectionable form of amusement can creep in. It is framed solely for the purpose of permitting theaters to remain open on Sunday. All that is asked by its supporters is a full and free expression on the part of the voters. Remember to cast your vote FOR the ordinance permitting motion picture theaters to remain open on Sunday, and urge your friends to do likewise.

Presumably there was no objection to the same names appearing on two or more lists, since each approach of a solicitor meant another appeal to the voter.

Apart from a lack of information and an undated front page, the only suggestions we can offer on the present form of vest pocket is a frequent change of house copy or else the preparation of three or four fronts to be used in rotation, and a change in the stock. The card is good quality, but the color is dead and lifeless. There is no attraction in a dead card. The tint should be brighter, as it would be if better dye were used. Probably a more vivid tint could be had for the same price by shopping around a little. The present red it a little too pale (not pink but pale), the blue is a neutral blue. The primrose makes the best appearance, because this has life. It would pay to speak to the printer.

If they want a more ample suggestion, pending the publication of our book, a stamped return envelope will bring an explanation.

Program Staff.

Here is some useful program stuff from Harold and Helen Ballou, of the Olympian, Seattle. It seems as much like old times to us to be getting the Ballou stuff again as it undoubtedly does to the patrons of the house.

> It is impossible to judge a photplay without seeing it (by title alone) and music without hearing it. Photoplay titles count for little, and a musical instrument no matter how fine without a competent player counts for less.
> This being so it is best to go to the theater where you usually see the best plays and hear a fine musical instrument played by a well qualified player.
> No effort or expense is spared to secure the best plays at The Olympian. The Pipe Organ is said by many to be the sweetest toned one in Seattle, and the music is generally liked.

House or ——?

The Clyde Glenn company sends in the first issue of The Theater Review, which is gotten out to look like an independent publication yet is wholly devoted to the Montgomery house. The front is very nicely done, black on white with a pale green tint block for the heading. On the inside pages the right hand ones wisely are kept for the house and the even numbers given the advertisers. As far as it goes it does nicely, but a little general matter about the pictures would help a great deal. There should be at least a page of material broken through the house notices to lead the reader along. One other mistake is the use of too much "dope" on a single picture in the same place. There are three clips from the company work for the "Caprices of Kitty." One story repeats the plot just told in another; a duplication of copy that assuredly will not interest. It is a waste of space. With a little study the issue can be made very attractive at no greater cost and with little greater labor. As it stands it is a good start.

From Australia.

Writing from Red Hill, Brisbane, Queensland, Australia, F. H. Moles tells interestingly of conditions in the antipodes, but promises to send advertising samples next time. He says:

> Rather a big address to start off with—but it's it. For weeks I have been going to write you, and now that I have started I'll do my best to let you know how business is in our little part of the world.
> Have been a very interested reader of the Moving Picture World for some months now, especially the "Advertising for Exhibitors" and "Projection Department." In fact, I have used quite a number of the "stunts" that have come to light in your department, and of course, made good. I have also "boosted" the Moving Picture World to a number of brother show men, and some of them have begun to take it up.
> Now let us talk about the town we are in—Brisbane. Population about 150,000, and has about 50 picture shows, two vaudeville houses, and an opera house, which is visited by touring shows. Nearly all the suburban shows are of the "Open Air" type, hence the word "Pops"—Popular Open Air Picture Shows, of which we are the originators and the only show using the name here. Our seasons are good here, running about ten months in the year. The other two months are put in alterations and repairs, and perhaps showing one night a week. None of the suburban places show more than three nights a week. Change of program each night at prices at sixpence and shilling (which is approximately twelve and twenty-four cents in your money). There are a number of film exchanges here, but most of the shows are dealing with one exchange (General Film Company of Australia, Ltd.). These people handle all of the principal European and American makers, including the "Mutual Movies." Keystone comedies have made good here. Put "Charley Chaplin" up in front of your house and good business is assured! Have shown quite a number of Keystones lately—"Property Man," "Dough and Dynamite, "His Prehistoric Past," etc. By the latest journal to hand, I see that Chaplin has gone over to the "Essanay," and we will be getting him just the same. There is only one fault with Keystones, and it is a general complaint among operators: that they are very hard to focus (Keystones, not operators). I don't know if it is in the film or in the operators. The shows I am interested in are using Powers Projectors No. 6, and can safely say after three years' use, we are giving a picture second to none in the town. The new Powers 6A has just arrived, and it has many good points about it, "Patent Loop Setter," an excellent idea, and is a great saving on the life of the film.
> Am interested in articles going through Projection Department—re Meniscus-Bi-Convex Condensors. Have used the above combination, but find that two Bi-Convex suits better. But there, it does not interest you.
> Will write to Editor Richardson later on this subject, stating my case. Quite a number of the trade have enlisted, and gone to the war. Up to the time of writing, the war has not affected the picture business—in fact, it has improved it. People won't pay carfare to go down town when they can get the same program, only a week later. Every showman gives eight reels (8,000 feet) in the programs, and perhaps a song or vaudeville turn—which is more than the town shows, with prices the same, give. There are quite a number of American showmen in this country who have all made good.
> This is the first time that I have written to you, but it will not be the last. Next time I will send some of our advertising "stunts" for you to pull to pieces or to do what you like with them, but do not treat us too harshly. Wishing you and the Moving Picture World every prosperity.

Think of being able to run an airdome ten months of a year!

Overdone.

The Vaudette theater, West Point, Ga., slips a little in the last sample sent, but they are entitled to a complete triple somersault, if they want to risk their necks, on the strength of their past record. They are working the wall paper stunt, but instead of plain wall paper they paste on an elaborate cut border and then print. As a result the many openings in the border let the ink through to the back sheet and the result is something that is hard to read, hard to keep and probably not worth the additional cost. It shows inventiveness, as does most of the stuff from West Point, but this time it hit outside the circles. The border is apt to get torn off and then there is no advertisement at all. Straight wall paper will possibly be carried around and shown to others as something unusually clever, but this is too awkward to handle.

We wonder what they will do next.

An Easter Card.

Ralph Ruffner, of the American, Butte, sends in his April Program on a three-fold Easter card, a really handsome product in colors with a panel on the reverse side for the address. It is one of the best productions of the sort we've seen, but that is the sort of stuff that Mr. Ruffner generally turns out. It would seem that few exhibitors marked the day with any special work, at least, this is the only sample that has come to our desk. The Ruffner cards are ready printed in color and require only one local impression for the type. Of course the ink is purple and this matches well with the predominant tint of the color printing.

Figured It Out.

The Third Street theater, Easton, Pa., sends in a couple of cards used for the Northampton, a sister house. One is a small primrose card printed in green ink. It merely announces that "There are twenty-one interesting days in Three Weeks." This, with rule work, takes up only part of the upper half. The lower portion merely carries in one corner the name of the house. They get an unusually neat effect and the pulling power is greater than would have been an elaborately worded announcement filling the entire face of the card.

Not so good is the other sample that states "You'll laugh when you see 'The Blue Mouse.'" There is a cut of a mouse in a six point oval and the name of the house, days and dates below, each of the three sections being boxed in. The card is odd, but it does not carry enough argument. The play of the same title is not so well known as Mrs. Glynn's book, and needs more explanation. We should be told why we will laugh, or we'll not be keen to see it.

Honest Now.

Honest and true, now, what do you think of this for a nice, tactful Lenten advertisement:

FRIDAY

CHAS. CHAPLIN in THE CHAMPION and THE PASSION PLAY or The Life of Christ, 4 Acts

That is the Good Friday advertising of a New Jersey exhibitor. We could express an opinion of the managerial ability of an exhibitor who does such things only this paper has to go through the mails. Even a light comedy would be out of place, but a Chaplin farce billed above the Passion Play is so far beyond the limit that it is out of sight.

That's the sort of thing that rouses the antagonism of church people and helps along the censorship moves. The offense is probably not intentional, but that makes no difference.

Two Answers.

B. A. Holway has been doing a lot of experimenting with the house advertising for Proctor's Broad Street theater, Elizabeth, N. J., and has gotten back to first principles. He writes:

> Again the Moving Picture Guide is appearing, now in practically its original form. Perhaps I may be accused of vaccilating, but whatever I may be accused of, I am trying my doggonedness to get out a program that will bring results and if I can't get it out one way I will another. I found that to get out the vest pocket edition the way I wanted cost me approximately as much per thousand as the Motion Picture Guide in its present form. Hence the reversion to the original form.

In an earlier letter he wrote he was getting very good results with the vest pocket form. Now he writes that it costs as much as the six by nine sheet he started and ended with. He can get more on the larger size, but if the vest pocket is a better medium, it is a better stunt to use, even though it does cost as much as a sheet four times as large. It is what a piece of advertising will bring that determines its value, and if more persons carried home the vest pocket, the V. P. should be used.

At the same time the Guide in its present form is done so well that we are inclined to believe that Mr. Holway has made the better choice, since he cannot have the regular little newspaper that run one issue.

We wish he would send in the circular mentioned on the back of the program, giving his plan for using the Kraus portraits. They seem to be working it on the coupon scheme, which gives everyone a chance and doesn't get the postoffice people busy on lottery violations.

Even Authors.

The Mary Anderson News, published by the theater of the same name in Louisville, seems to think that perhaps theatergoers might be interested in some star authors as well as players and in a recent first issue prints sketches of Tolstoi, Zangwill, Broadhurst and Grace Miller White; not long biographies, but short, snappy sketches. Each, of course, is the author of some coming play at the Mary Anderson. In other ways it strays from the beaten tracks with good results. One idea is to print a dispiay advertisement in the middle of a page and fill out with the running story, only they probably dummied the text and then used the rest of the space as a gauge. It is odd and effective for a change where but one title is used to a page. Where this is done the advertisement should not be boxed in.

The same house sends in a fake telegram that is not very deceptive and a subpoena that is. On the outside it is a duplicate of a real subpoena in all save that it is from the "circular" instead of a "circuit" court. Inside the typesetting suggests the legal form, but a second glance shows the names of well known players. The greeting is that the patrons are commanded "to appear before us one of the four days starting Sunday, October 11, that you may give testimony to the proof of" the acting ability of the players in the headlined plays. This antedates the recent write up of the Hot Springs subpoena. It is not alone the idea you use, but the manner in which you carry it out that counts. A subpoena that stops looking like one the moment you open the sheet is not as good as one where you have to rub your eyes and look twice.

THE PHOTOPLAYWRIGHT

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

INQUIRIES.

Questions concerning photoplay writing addressed to this department will be replied to by mail if a fully addressed and stamped envelope accompanies the letter, which should be addressed to this department. Questions should be stated clearly and should be typewritten or written with pen and ink. Under no circumstances will manuscripts or synopses be criticised, whether or not a fee is sent therefor.

A list of companies will be sent if the request is made to the paper direct and not to this department, and a return stamped envelope is enclosed.

Crisis and Climax.

SOME correspondents seem to be uncertain as to the difference between climax and crisis. It has all been explained time and again, but perhaps it can be put into more simple language. A crisis is an almost climax. You think that when the crisis comes the story must end, but something happens and the story goes on and is even more interesting than before because of the crisis.

Jane is cook in a mining camp. She loves Jack and Henry loves her. Jack wants her, too, and she promises to marry him. but the day of the wedding Henry comes along with the two best horses in the studio outfit, slings Jane to the hurricane deck of one of them and dashes off. If that was the last we ever saw of Jane it would be the climax of a story, but the script says that Jack starts in pursuit, and so it is not the climax but merely a crisis. Before it was just the story of two men and a woman. Now we have the added factor of the consequences of the abduction. It is no longer a couple of polite courtships of the same woman. The crisis brings in a new plot action iaction and the interest grows. Now Jack and his friends catch up with Henry and Jane. Henry shoots Jack. If he killed him that might be the climax, but he merely wings him. This delays pursuit and Henry gets a better lead. It is a crisis and once more the interest grows. Henry takes Jane to a deserted shack. Jane unwisely prefers death to dishonor, though Henry merely wants to marry her. That gets Henry sore and he says he'll do anything to be obliging. He starts to draw his gun, but Jane jumps on him and wrests the gun away. Here is another crisis. We see Jack and his friends riding down the trail. They pass the point where we saw Henry quit the trail for the unmarked path to the shack. This is a climax. Jack is riding past and the chance of rescue is lost. But just then Henry hurls a stool at Jane. It knocks the gun from her hand, but it is discharged. She falls to the floor and Henry picks up the gun and stands over her. Here are two crises, one after the other. We go back to Jack. He hears the shot. The little posse turns back and rides toward the shack. Henry stands over Jane and prepares to shoot. Just at that moment he hears the sound of horses and dashes from the cabin. Jack rushes in. They clinch. Here is another crisis. Jack is victor, but Henry shakes him off and starts to make his escape. The sheriff shoots him. Jane staggers from the shack and falls into Jack's arms. Climax.

Of course we could go on and show that Jack marries Jane, but the man, woman or child who cannot guess that fact does not deserve to be admitted to a picture theater.

If Jack and Henry merely courted Jane in the usual fashion and Jane married Jack and Henry went off to look for some other girl to propose to there would be history instead of story because there is lacking the real plot elements. The crises make for interest and interest makes the story.

4687643.

We've just disposed of another case of "stealing." Both stories had a picture of the Madonna in them. That was all. You'll never write a good story if you feel certain it will be stolen.

Synopses.

William Lord Wright has printed two letters from Miss Elizabeth R. Carpenter lately telling how much better it is to write synopses only. If everyone wrote synopses only where would the photoplay game get to? We like William but not when he does things like that. Miss Carpenter would probably write in action if she could, but she gave up the idea because she found she could not. We like better Lawrence McCloskey's attitude that even if you cannot write good action, writing action of some sort helps you to frame up your stories.

Second Section.

Business must be mighty bad with the schools. A. W. Thomas now comes out with "six big lessons" into which are condensed "the complete instruction, step by step, with one of my pupils." And this is all yours for a mere five spot. It takes a lot more than thirty steps to reach success, as purchasers are apt to find out, but each part of the lesson contains five "steps," and five times six are thirty.

We wonder if there are thirty step lessons in the full Thomas course.

Telling It.

Howard Irving Young, of the Eastern Reliance office, writes:

> Came across a script in today's batch from which I think you may be able to glean a sermon to use in the column if you like. It was written by a man who has very good ideas of plot construction and possesses a more than the average amount of intelligence. If this were not the case I would not refer further to his deliquency for lots worse come in every day from the "nuts." Here, however, is a man who should know better. The first three scenes of his script follow:
> Scene 1. Garden. Grace and Tom discovered—talking gayly—Grace places flower in Tom's coat—exit Grace—Tom watches her.
> Scene 2. Living Room. Servant enters followed by Frank—. Frank exits into
> Scene 3. Garden. Tom greets Frank—they talk—Frank tells of his wish to marry Grace—asks Tom's good wishes and help—Tom cast down—Frank realizes Tom is in love with his ward—Tom promises to speak to Grace—they exunt.
> And so on about the same strain. You will kindly notice that the author has not seen fit to write any leaders explaining the relations of the various characters but has left it entirely to the imagination. How do we know Tom is Grace's guardian or that Frank wants to marry her? Just one little leader might have dispelled the cloud. Later in the script leaders aplenty occur, mostly of the "Two Weeks Later'" variety, however.

Ever see a street fakir—a good one—work? He'll do a couple of card tricks. Then he'll borrow something from someone and explain he is going to vanish it. Half way through the trick he stops and talks business. He has the interest of the crowd. They will listen to his patter to wait and see how the trick comes out.

Play up a big fact in the opening scenes and get the interest. Let the spectator know from the start what it is about and he'll become engrossed, but if you wait too long to explain he has said a few things to himself and has gone to sleep. The author has put in scene three all he thinks is necessary, but he does not give it in such a fashion that the audience can get it, and they are the ones to be told.

Same Here.

Arthur Leeds writes in the Photoplay Author that a woman wrote him she was cross with Melville Davisson Post for telling in a recent article a plot that she was going to use. The theme was the explosion of a gun by the rays of the sun shining through a pitcher of water, acting as a burning glass.

Mr. Post probably used the example because it was so old. Mr. Leeds points out that several film stories have also been done with this theme. He might have added that practically every author has done one story on this theme. We'll own up to having sold the same idea eight or ten times in the course of as many years to the same newspaper syndicate. We always gave it a new dressing and ran the gamut of properties from two watch crystals filled with water and cemented together, through a flaw in the glass, an ornamental bull's eye to a regular magnifying glass designedly fixed by the scheming villain.

Mr. Leeds' correspondent thought the idea was new with her. If she had seen any part of the thousands of other stories she would have known to the contrary. We could sell the same story again tomorrow, if we wanted to take time to write it, by having the locale a submarine and the burning glass a deadlight illuminating the torpedo chamber and blowing the boat to kingdom come and the bottom of the sea in one time and two motions.

Just because you think it or think you think it does not make it new. What you add to it in the way of novelty is what redeems the idea.

Starting In.

Fads seem to run in circles, and just now it appears to be the fad to start your story about twenty years ago and bring it down to date. Little Sissy and Tommy Jones are playfellows. "Leader—Twenty Years Later." Now Sissy and Johnnie meet again and the story starts. What happened in those far-off childhood days has no more to do with the story than has the doings of their children's children fifty years hence, but the "kid stuff" is written to make it more interesting, as usual and Editors damn and producers swear, and all to no effect.

Start your story where it starts, and in starting be careful to give the story the right keynote. Do not make the first important action occur with the hero and some character, who does not again appear sharing an important scene. Give first the action that has a direct bearing on the story. Do not, for example, show that Jim wants to go on the stage, run five or six scenes in and about the theater on this theme and then suddenly switch to the fact that Jim becomes a banker because his mother thinks that is more respectable when all of the time the story is how the President of the Bank tries to blame Jim for his own peculations, and his daughter, who is Jim's sweetheart, saves him from jail. If the story you are telling is the above, forget that Jim wanted to go on the stage just as you ignore the fact that he went to school and in swimming and got licked by the town bully. Let the first scene establish the relationship between Jim, the President and the girl. Then show that the President is a crook, show that he plans to incriminate Jim and so on to the climax where the President shoots himself in the scenery or the carpet and dies while James grabs the girl with one hand and calls for the coroner with the other. That Jim has once been smitten with the stage fever has no more to do with the real story than has the fact that he once had long yellow curls and a smug smile. Playing up the stage stuff first will lead us to expect the story of how Jim was cured of his ambition and resentment in the fact that we do not see the story we expected may lead us to dislike the otherwise good story told.

Getting Plots.

Over in the next block a man is walking on the roof with a bag of corn and an inviting smile. For weeks he has been trying to tame some wild pigeons that accept his corn but not his invitation to make his roof their address.

Does that suggest any story to you? It does to us. For instance there is the wild child of nature whom the city visitor seeks to win. Like the pigeons she will hover near but not fall into the net. Like the birds she has an instinctive sense of evil. Put in a rural lover and a thrashed villain and it should be a pretty good story.

There are several carrier pigeon stories that suggest themselves. There are the birds used to carry messages between lovers. That is old but can be dressed up. There is the war story with the bird flying with the message for help. There is the idea of castaways on the desert island. There is a crate of pigeons aboard. It is not very far from their home cote. Shall they be eaten or released with messages imploring aid? Shall they reach home or be shot by the hero or the villain? Perhaps some big commercial deal is to be swung by means of pigeons from aboard a ship. Suppose that the heroine replaces the birds with ones from her own cote and gets the messages herself instead of their being delivered to the assistant villain. Or suppose that Jones and Brown love carriers. Jones goes on a business trip that is a blind for a fishing excursion with three bottles of whiskey for every fish caught. Suppose he takes some birds to tell Smith all about it and gets home to find out that he took his own birds by mistake and that Mrs. Jones has all the letters.

Almost anything will suggest a story if you will know how to dig it out.

Calling Again.

Here are two questions that are practically one:

> I sent a comedy script to a reliable company, and they held it for several weeks, mailing me during that time two postals, stating it was being held for consideration. Later they returned it with a message: "Sorry this good little comedy does not fit in just now," and signed by the editor himself. I especially want to see that company do the play. Now would it be according to Hoyle to wait a few weeks and send it in again?
> I have just received comedy with: "Too many leaders—idea not bad—capable of development." I see where they are right about the leaders. Now would you change it and send it back to same company or to another? The writing was by hand, not the usual rejection slip, or rather I should say it was written on the margin of a rejection slip.

In regard to the first, it seems to have been with the Vitagraph. Probably the script was being held for the personal approval of Mr. Blackton or Mr. Smith. One or the other passes on all scripts. In this case it would seem that postals are sent out when the two heads are too busy to read, not as encouragement but as a matter of courtesy. The final decision having been in the negative, it would seem that the story was not quite what was wanted. It would be well, in such a case, to wait a while and submit again only after material revision and strengthening, calling attention to the improvement in the story.

In the second case the indications are more clear. The editor liked the idea but did not like the development—or rather lack of it. Here the proper course would be revision to strengthen, elimination of the leaders and resubmission to the same company with a note calling attention to the circumstances.

The writer adds:

> What's puzzling me right now is when can a person tell when a story has reached its full growth? I wrote a story in October and sent it out. The company kept it six weeks and sent it back. I was really glad to see it, for during that time I had thought of a way to write it so much better. I did this and it changed from a one reel to a two-reel script. I did not send it out at once but held it three or four weeks and went on writing my average output of two scripts a week. Then I made the finished script and sent it on its way. (Back to the same company that had held it so long.) A check came back so quick that I had to lay off writing a few hours to celebrate. I thought I was through with that story, but would you believe it that story is still growing and try as I will I can't forget it. Yet it has been sold and released, and I am all the time busy writing other stories. Have you ever been afflicted like that and did you find a remedy? I can't do any more with it—why can't I forget it?

This is not puzzling at all. In its early form the story was not right. Revision brought it to the point where it would sell, but not to the fullest development of which the author is capable. It will always remain a personal reproach to the writer as an incomplete task. But for that matter, there never was a story that could not be improved upon if carefully studied with a desire to still further develop. Each time you write a story you are better qualified to rewrite your previous stories, for with each story you write comes a broader knowledge. We know one author who sends in an addenda whenever he thinks of new business for a sold script. This is good practice, but only where the author knows enough of the work to know when a change really is an improvement.

The Comedy Spirit.

If you write comedy, you need something more than the comedy plot done into comedy action. You need to give it the comedy spirit. That is one reason so many comedies come back. In spite of the fact that they offer comedy ideas and comedy action they are soggy and depressing. There is no "lift" to the telling of the story, but instead the same careful labored development that is given the dramatic story.

Now mind you careful development is one thing and labored development quite another. Labored development is that in which each factor is laboriously established and built up upon to the complete whole. It is slow and ponderous in movement, suited to the drama but not to comedy. The comedy telling of a story should fairly bubble with mirth and enthusiasm. You should give it a vim and snap that are not confined to the bare action. You should—not in words, but in business—give an air of jocularity to the theme. Instead of telling that Jim falls into a washtub, you should say "Ha, ha!—Here's that fool Jim coming along, and I'll bet a dime he falls into the tub. He's the darndest cuss, that Jim—always getting into some trouble. You just watch and see for yourself if he doesn't get that bath."

You do not put it that way, because you are telling the story in action and not in words, but you tell that in action, perhaps something like this:

19—Yard—Mandy washing clothes—large tub of water—she takes clothes out—starts for house.

20—Street—Jim comes along—bumps into old woman—knocks her down—she sits on her bonnet box—crushes it—Jim apologizes—starts to lift her up—she bangs him with umbrella—he is so startled he lets her drop again—picks her up a second time—exits—she yells after him.

Through that scene twenty we begin to laugh at the tub, because we know he is going to fall in, but it is not best to bring him in and have him make the tumble at once. Instead—

21—Yard as in No. 19—Jim enters walking backward—almost up to the tub—suddenly turns—sees—laughs at his narrow escape—turns back—speaks again—

22—Back to No. 20—Old woman throws a bundle—

23—Back to No. 21—Jim sees bundle coming—dodges bundle but falls into tub.

Now the first time you are disappointed that he is not going to get a wetting, but the second time he does drop and the scene is then all the funnier because he knows the tub is there and avoided it once. It is a lot funnier than a single scene in which—

19—Yard—Jim runs into scene—falls in tub—up—exits.

Instead of that bare action we now have five scenes and three laughs. The secret of multiplying one laugh into two or three is making people think that something will happen, showing it is not going to happen and then have it happen after all. If you just have it happen, you get just one laugh to the idea.

Why the Exception?

William Lord Wright says that, "Next to a quince there is nothing so bitter as a disappointed author." Why the exception? We never bit into a quince, but we'll back the disappointed author against anything in sight, only we don't mean a disappointed author but one who has tried in vain to be an author—which is probably what Mr. Wright means.

It seems almost impossible to make a disappointed man realize that his failure is due to himself and not to external causes. He fails to sell, not because his stories are not good, because he knows that they are vastly better than what he sees on the screen. He does not sell either because all editors are either fools or thieves or both. Either he has seen his story in film, or there never were such stories on the screen. He does not know that the story "like his" he sees on the screen is not a steal from him, but an idea so stale as to be common property and he cannot realize that most editors are anxious to get writers who can write. Most editors must turn in a stated number of stories a week. If they cannot buy them they must write them, and generally they would prefer to buy, but want to pay for something that is worth money.

And the pathetic part is that the less a man or woman knows about writing the greater is the certainty that all the stuff written is far above the average, and the more bitter they are against the unkind fate that keeps them down when others far less capable find success. It is one of the things that makes us hate the schools. Their advertising is so largely responsible for the belief that any one, no matter how incompetent, can write.

How, Indeed?

A southern writer wants to know what's the use of learning to write plays if all the work is done by inside writers. Another, a New Yorker, asks the same question in slightly different form. In both cases the answer is "How did the insiders get their jobs? By being good outsiders." That's the real answer. Six months ago a man put much the same question to us. Today he is an editor. Harry Chandlee, of the Lubin staff, had the same uncertainty. The list might be continued indefinitely.

Manufacturers' Notice.

It is an established rule of this department that no apparatus or other goods will be endorsed or recommended editorially until the excellence of such articles has been demonstrated to its editor.

Important Notice.

Owing to the mass of matter awaiting publication it is impossible to reply through the department in less than two to three weeks. In order to give prompt service, those sending four cents, stamps (less than actual cost), will receive carbon copy of the department reply, by mail, without delay. Special replies by mail on matters which cannot be replied to in the department, one dollar.

Both the first and second set of questions are now ready and printed in neat booklet form, the second half being seventy-six in number. Either booklet may be had by remitting 25 cents, money or stamps, to the editor, or both for 40 cents. Cannot use Canadian stamps. Every live, progressive operator should get a copy of these questions. You may be surprised at the number you cannot answer without a lot of study.

Question No. 84.

Best answer will be published, and the names of others sending in replies of excellence will appear in the Roll of Honor. Theater managers looking for high class men will do well to watch the Roll of Honor.

How can you arrange your rheostats so that you will know instantly when one of them develops a ground, regardless of whether the rheostat be in the operating room or outside of it? Illustrate this by sketch. Also tell us how you would test your rheostat for a coil or grid grounded to the frame, and how you would proceed to locate the individual grounded coil or grid?

Roll of Honor on Question No. 78.

The Roll of Honor on Question No. 78 is made up of the following: Joseph H. M. Smith, Fort Worth, Texas; John Solar, Watertown, New York; L. C. LaGrow, Albany, New York; A. C. Stewart, Pendleton, Oregon; M. W. Larmour, Waco, Texas; W. C. Crawford, Brooklyn, New York; J. H. Hanson, Lubec, Maine; F. V. Poyser, Brandon, Manitoba; Montreal, Canada, and C. E. Lawson, Cleveland, Tennessee.

Many of the answers were excellent, and all of those included in the Roll of Honor were practically correct. I have selected the reply of Brother Larmour for publication, because it is quite brief and very plain; in other words, it tells a reasonably complete story in few words.

Reply to Question No. 78.

By M. W. Larmour, Waco, Texas.

The Question:

What do you understand by a "fixed resistance rheostat?" What do you understand by the "fixed resistance" of an adjustable rheostat, and how much must there be? Explain, in detail, illustrated by sketch if necessary, the workings of an adjustable rheostat.

The Answer:

The fixed resistance rheostat is one in which no provision is made whereby the resistance may be increased or decreased by increasing or decreasing the number of coils or resistance wire in the circuit.

The fixed resistance of an adjustable rheostat is that part of the resistance which cannot be cut out of circuit by means of regulating or adjusting. There must be enough fixed resistance to keep the current below that number of amperes which would over-heat the wires.

In the diagram A and B are binding posts, C a sliding contact lever, D, E, F, G, H contact points, each one connected to a different part of the resistance coils, as shown. With sliding lever C on contact E, as per sketch, current enters at A, passing along jumper to sliding lever C, through sliding lever C to contact point E, along jumper to the resistance coils, through the seven coils in circuit to binding post B, and thence to the lamp. If more resistance (less amperage) is desired, lever C is moved to the right to contact D, whereupon the whole resistance of the rheostat will be in circuit. By moving lever C to the left the resistance is gradually cut out, until contact H is reached. The coils now left in the circuit, four in number, represent the fixed resistance.

The points D, E, F, G, H, are placed close enough together so that lever C in moving will make contact with one before it leaves the other; thus the resistance can be adjusted without entirely cutting off the current.

There are several methods of changing the resistance of adjustable rheostats, such as a series of switches by means of which resistance is cut in or out; by providing separate binding posts, so that by changing the connection a certain portion of the resistance will be cut in and out. The method shown in the diagram is, I think, everything considered, most satisfactory.

Hoboken Operators?

In response to an invitation from Local 384, Hoboken, N. J., the editor journeyed into the wilds of that picturesque suburb of Gotham, April 17th, and attended a meeting which convened at the ghostly hour of midnight—the hour when graveyards yawn and moving picture theaters give up their operators.

The Hoboken union has under its jurisdiction all of Hudson County, which includes Jersey City, Bayonne, Hoboken and other surrounding cities. I am informed there are approximately 200 moving picture operators eligible to membership in Local 384. Every seat in the hall was filled, and the membership was a fine appearing body of men. The boys are enthusiastic, and are, I believe, heading their ship of unionism in the right direction. Their president, Brother I. G. Sherman, is not only an able presiding officer, but he is also a mighty level headed chap, and a good operator, too. Incidentally, let me say that Mr. Bishop, manager and owner of the Bishop theater, where Sherman is employed, was the first Hoboken manager to recognize the new union. I had a little talk with Friend Bishop and he impressed me as a real manager—a man of good, sound sense and good ideas.

The meeting was addressed by Brothers Stephens of Local 35, New York City, by the business agent of the Hoboken Stage Employes' Union, and by the editor. In my talk I tried to impress upon the men the fact that the strength of the union would not only depend upon numbers but upon the quality of the membership. Brother Sherman in introducing the editor spoke of this point, and he never made a truer statement in his life. There is, of course, strength in numbers, but that strength is usually augmented when the numbers are composed of men who are highly proficient in their business. Take two organizations composed of doctors, for instance, one having a large membership made up of quacks, and the other half the membership of the first, but that membership composed of high class physicians. In the end which organization do you think will prove more powerful? The answer, it seems to me, is simple. But if, on the other hand, the large membership of quacks could be converted into high class men, then that would be another story; they would then be almost invincible, and that is a thing I preach to operators' unions. Educate your members in projection. If you are compelled to accept into membership inefficient men, then it is up to you to make them over into at least fairly efficient men, also it is up to you to see to it that your members produce the right kind of results on the screen, and to punish those who by reason of carelessness bring discredit on the union through faulty projection, provided always, of course, the fault lies with the operator and not with the manager. We must, of course, always recognize the fact that some operators are handicapped in their work through the refusal of the manager to provide proper equipment. Local 384 has the best wishes of this department and its editor. May it live long and flourish.

An Error.

In "Those Experiments," page 554, April 24th issue, the address of Brother Charles D. Armstrong was given as Superior, Wis. This is an unfortunate error. Friend Armstrong is with the Majestic Theater Company, Ashland, Wis.

Piffle!

Montreal, Canada, encloses answer to question 76 and says:

> Concerning article published in a recent issue, emanating from Carl Laemmle, there is a lot of truth in what that gentleman says. He certainly hits a lot of operators, or near operators, but, after all, what good is it going to do him, the Universal or anyone else? It will be widely read, but I hardly think the Universal will do as they say and put real operators in place of the poor ones. That distinguished corporation would have some job to do that, and while I, personally, wish they would do it I have not the slightest expectation of seeing the "Friendly Warning" materialize. In reading a sample copy of a certain supposed-to-be trade publication I was struck by an article, or editorial, in its "Projection Department," in which the statement was made that an operator should have no more electrical knowledge than is necessary to run his arc lamp and his resistor (Chinese for rheostat, I suppose) and not have to know how to do any figuring, or know any wiring rules, as he never has to do wiring. Says good projection is what is wanted. Granted the truth of that statement, still, how is a man going to put on good projection if, for instance, his wires are too small and he don't know where the trouble is, or how to find it? Oh, well, what is the use bothering with such foolishness." The only trouble is, it seems a shame that some near-operator will read that and think if he can turn the crank and keep a light on the screen that is all that is necessary.

The best answer to statements made by the editor in question is that some states, and nearly all large cities require the moving picture operator to pass an examination, and that four-fifths of this examination is directly in relation to matters electrical. The authorities in these states and cities not only require the operator to understand how to measure wires, understand thoroughly the action of the three-wire and multiple arc system, but they also require him to understand the operation of transformers, resistance and many other things of similar nature, and unless he does understand them he is not considered a safe man to have in charge of an operating room and will not be given a license to operate in these cities and states. As a matter of fact, in nine cases out of ten, cities and states examine the applicant but very briefly as regards his knowledge of the optical end of projection, and the license issued by the city of New York states expressly on its face that: "This is not a certificate of ability to throw a good picture." The proof of this is found in the accompanying cut of a New York City license card.

This I believe fully answers the statement made by the editor of the projection department of the publication in question. There may, however, perhaps be a little sour grapes mixed up in the matter, since I understand that after assuming his editorial duties the gentleman in question made application for a New York operator's license, was examined, and not only failed to pass, but, according to absolutely reliable information, failed good and plenty. I do not know that the advice of this editorial gentleman has been tinctured or influenced by the aforesaid fact, but—maybe. The only interest of the incident lies in the fact that, as Montreal has said, some near-operator might read it and take it as proof that there was no further need for him to try to improve his knowledge of the electrical end of his profession.

As to the Laemmle matter, I do not quite agree with you. The publication of things of that kind does a great deal of good. Of course one publication of it don't upset the earth, but if you keep hammering away you will get results, even as this department has gotten results in thousands of operating rooms in this and other countries. It did not accomplish results in a minute, an hour, a day, a week or a year. It took more than five years—yes, nearly six, to reach our present state of advancement, and during the next five or six years I expect to get even greater results. We have tried during all these years to build up and improve. We have worked hard; harder than most of you have any idea of, and we will admit that it does, to some extent get our goat to have men who never projected a picture in all their innocent young lives pose as authorities and try to tear down or injure that work. However, I suppose both Montreal and myself are wasting good ink and energy over something that really is of but slight importance.

Screen Guaranteed.

The Minusa Cine Products Company, manufacturers of moving picture screens, St. Louis, Mo., has written the department as follows:

> We note a letter in a recent issue of your department from C. A. Razor, Rushville, Ind. We immediately wired this gentleman and later wrote him saying we would take back his screen and re-finish it in our factory. Moreover, you are hereby authorized to make this same offer to any dissatisfied users of radium gold fibre screens. We will take back to our factory in St. Louis any screen sold by Mr. Anderson during his connection with either the American Theater Curtain & Supply Company, St. Louis, or the Atsco Company, New York City, up to date of March 1, this year. We will re-finish these screens, using our latest and most approved method, making it waterproof and washable at a charge of exactly what the raw materials cost us, this in no event to exceed 15 cents per square foot, and perhaps considerable less, according to the condition of the screen returned. This would entail some loss to us, but we are perfectly willing to stand that loss; hence, as we said, you are at liberty to make the above offer through the department. Please understand we are not pretending to be philanthropists, but do believe that service such as this will be the means of gaining the confidence of those to whom we look for business, and we certainly do want the good will of the exhibitors, and intend to secure the same, if square dealing will get it. As regards the guarantee on our screens, they are sold on an absolute five-year guarantee against either deterioration of material or faulty workmanship, and we further guarantee the Minusa Gold Fibre Screen to be waterproof and washable. We hereby authorize you to refer to us any dissatisfied user of any Gold Fibre screen and we will guarantee to you that we will perfectly satisfy such users.

This all sounds very good indeed. The editor of this department is an absolute believer in square dealing. Hot air and soft soap have their purposes, but when applied to the getting of business, or rather when business is sought on a hot air basis, and dissatisfied customers receive no greater satisfaction than a dose of soft soap, then those two commodities are not fulfilling their legitimate functions, and the company which tries to run its business along those lines ought to, and will, sooner or later (let us hope sooner), meet its Waterloo and sink back into the mire of dishonesty from which it arose.

Now, please don't think I am hitting at anybody. I am not. But I hope every manufacturer will read this and see whether it, or any part of it, fits his particular case. If it does then let him do a little spring house cleaning; if it don't then let us hope that he prospers, for his business is founded in honesty.

A New Union.

The Moving Picture Operators of Hudson County, New Jersey, have received a charter from the I. A. T. S. E., and are prepared to admit any competent operator who can pass a satisfactory examination, and who has operated a projection machine for a period of six months in that county. Prospective members can get full information by addressing either the president, or secretary, whose address will be found in the directory at the front of the directory. Initation fee will remain at $5.00 until further notice. Meetings held at Gruber's Hall, 85 Washington Street, Hoboken, N. J.

Well, gentlemen, I am glad to see you have climbed into the band wagon and joined the parade. I have met quite a number of the Hoboken boys, and naturally I am glad to see you keep together. I trust you will generate the steam of your unionism with the coal of justice, and use for your throttle enthusiasm, lubricated with the oil of common sense, and that your speed will be governed by the brake of justice as between man and man. Remember, boys, the union is a mighty good thing, a splendid thing, a magnificent thing, if rightly used, but it may be very easily turned into an instrument of oppression and injustice. The editor of this department will, both personally, and with such influence as the department itself may have, back your efforts for better salaries and better conditions, always, provided you, yourselves, advance and make yourselves worthy of better conditions and better salaries, by giving in return for those salaries high class work, not sometimes but ALL the time. My compliments to local 384. May it become a power for good, not only to its members but to the industry in Hoboken.

The Strand Theater, Nashville, Tennessee.

The Strand Theater is one of Nashville's newest and most up-to-date picture play houses. Also, according to advice, it was the first Nashville house to sign an agreement with the operators' union. Manager Shelton is an up-to-date progressive man, who believes firmly in a policy of fairness, and seems to have an ingrowing idea that the operator really is entitled to some consideration. Now that is queer, because I have had the same idea myself for a long time. Is it not strange how great minds run in the same general direction?

Yum, Yum!

F. W. George, Wells River, Vermont, sent in a mysterious looking box recently, and after first taking due and proper precautions to see that it was not one of those perfectly awful infernal machines, we dug into its chronometer balance, and there found some genuine Green Mountain maple sugar, hence the heading of this particular item. Brother George says:

> This is a little token of remembrance from old Vermont. It is not to be published in the Moving Picture World. I sent it to show you I have not forgotten you, and that I appreciate the department. Received the question booklet and it is O. K.

G'wan, man! After absorbing a chunk of that concentrated maple sap do you suppose I can restrain myself from acknowledging its receipt, and the fact that I appreciate the kindly spirit in which it was sent? It was mighty good sugar. It has traveled the road all goodies are supposed to travel. Yum, yum!

The Wotton Rexolux.

There has recently been placed on the market a new machine built by the Electric Products Company, Cleveland, Ohio, known as the Wotton Rexolux, designed to rectify alternating current at line voltage into direct current at arc voltage. This machine is of such unique construction, and involves such a radical departure from all former practice in motor generator sets, as applied to projection, that it is worthy of extended description.

The entire machine, as per Fig. 1, occupies floor space approximately 17" x 20", and has an over-all height of about 5 feet. The armature sets in vertical position, or, in other words, stands on end, and is carried or supported on ball bearings. 18, Fig. 1, is the alternating current motor housing, and 7, Fig. 1, is the casting forming the field magnet, and supporting the pole pieces of the direct current generator. The D.C. generator is of the interpole type, there being four inner poles and four main poles. The interpole feature is an important one, since it makes possible the handling of heavy fluctuations in current without sparking at the brush—or at least with sparking reduced to a negligible quantity, the manufacturer claiming that there is none at all. It acts as an aid to commutation, and at the same time produces a constant current characteristic which is most desirable for projection work, as will be explained further on.

In order to reduce vibration and noise to a minimum the vertical type of construction is used. The ball bearings reduce the friction load very greatly, which partly accounts for the high efficiency of Rexolux. In order to secure a perfect armature balance the manufacturers test each machine in a dynamic balance at a speed of 7,000 revolutions per minute, which is approximately four times full load speed. The forced ventilation produced by the fan between the rotor and armature keeps the machine cool. The plan adopted for lubrication is simple, and requires little attention. The machines are shipped assembled, and all the leads are marked and of proper length to reach to the switchboard above the generator, so that the outfit can be connected up by anyone capable of reading a blue print. Full instructions and wiring diagrams are shipped with each machine.

The vertical construction of the machine allows, in many instances, of its installation in the operating room, since only a very small space is required. This has decided advantages in that line loss is reduced to a minimum, and the cost of installation is greatly reduced, the machine is directly under the eye of the operator, and the operator is enabled to vary his amperage at will.

One of the important features of this equipment (type MM or MMA) is the ability to dissolve from one lamp to the other without a perceptible decrease in the light, and the machine is so arranged that before you change from one lamp to the other it is possible to heat up the carbons of one lamp with say, 15 amperes, while operating the other lamp at 50 amperes. While the type MM or MMA machine is only rated for constant duty as a 50 ampere equipment, yet it is designed to stand 80 amperes during the change, provided that change does not occupy more than five minutes. The fact that this machine is semi-enclosed, and provided with grid iron covers, protects it against possible injury from accidental contact with foreign bodies. These machines are provided with a fan which gives forced ventilation, the same being mounted on the armature shaft at 5, Fig. 2. There is an ammeter and voltmeter on the switchboard, as shown in Fig. 1 (type MA or MMA only). The armature is supported entirely on ball bearings, the lower one, which carries its entire weight, being supplied with lubricant by grease cup 21, Fig. 1. The construction of the upper bearing is shown in Fig. 3, in which 4 and 5 form the inner and outer shell of the ball race carrying balls 6. The inner race 5, is locked to armature shaft 9, by nut 2, and revolves therewith. The outer race 4 sets in a recess in the main frame casting and is stationary. 10 is an oil-well. 7, Fig. 1, is an oil thrower, which is locked to the shoulder of shaft 9 under inner ball race 5, by nut 2, and revolves at armature speed. The action is that the oil is, by centrifugal force, thrown up through passage 3, whence it descends through and around balls 6 by gravity, thus flooding the entire bearing with a constant stream of oil; 13 is the plug which closes the upper end of passage 11 through which oil-well 10 is filled; 12 is a plug, by the removal of which oil-well 10 may be drained and washed out with kerosene.

The machine is so built that it may be quickly disassembled into three main parts, viz.: lower casting 18, Fig. 1, upper casting 7, Fig. 1, and the armature. This is a very convenient feature when it comes to the matter of installation, particularly where the machine must be hoisted into an operating room, or placed in some other room comparatively difficult of access.

Another valuable feature lies in the fact that the motor windings are in parallel, so that they can be connected up to take current from either a 110 or 220 volt supply, the latter with the windings connected in series.

These machines are made to take supply from 110, 220, 440 or 550 volt lines and from either 25, 30, 40, 50 or 60 cycle current, single, two, or three phase. They are made in different sizes, delivering respectively 35, 50 and 70 amperes for continuous duty, 50, 80 or 114 amperes intermittently only, the latter being what is known as the "two-arc" machine. The 50 ampere size is designed as the standard size, and permits of the operation of two lamps alternately, with ability to heat up the carbons of one lamp while the other is burning, and the dissolving of one picture into the next without any perceptible decrease in the illumination of the screen. In Fig. 1, switch E, a triple-pole, double-throw switch for single phase, or, four-pole for two or three phase, is the "starting" switch. Switch G, a double-pole, single-throw switch controls the projection circuit. F controls the field resistance through a series of contact points.

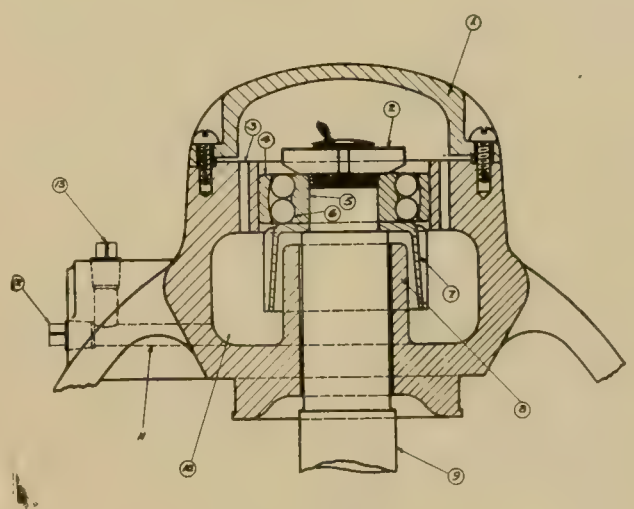

FIG. 3.

After looking into this matter carefully, and examining into the electrical performance of the machine, getting reports from the United Electric Light & Power Company, which has made exhaustive tests of its over-all efficiency, I am prepared to say that the new Wotton Rexolux has the unqualified endorsement of this department. It is an excellent machine, from both the mechanical and electrical point of view. It is solid in construction, has an over-all efficiency second to none that we have reports on, and has very little vibration, and is easy to handle in changing from one lamp to the other.

Hippodrome Installation.

As noted in a recent issue of the World, the largest theater in America, the New York Hippodrome, has gone over, bag and baggage, to moving pictures. As I recollect the matter the Hippodrome seats approximately 6,000 people, and it has, for many years past, staged the most magnificent spectacular productions ever put on in this, and, I think, in any other country. Five years ago, if we had even suggested that this theater would abandon its spectacular productions for moving pictures we would have been hooted, but moving pictures are, nevertheless, in full swing in the Hippodrome, and it is expected they will remain for good and all.

And now I have got to do some pretty severe criticising. I don't like to do it. It's a shame that it should be necessary. But imagine, if you can, a house seating approximately 6,000, playing to almost 150,000 people a week, with an "operating room" (?) about 6 or 7 feet, by not more than 8 feet, and with its ceiling approximately 7 feet from the floor. And that is not all. The two-inch conduit containing the machine feeders runs across the floor from the back wall to a position under the lamphouse of each machine, right where the operators must stumble over it practically every time they move. Why, there is not even a double set of fuses to change over if one set blows, or even so much as a main switch in the operating room to kill the circuits; just a little, sawed-off iron box containing the fuses. How long, Oh Lord, how long will important installations, such as this, be left to men who display the rankest kind of incompetency and by their stupidity and inexcusable ignorance handicap the work of the operators for all time to come.

The projection during the first week, while it was under the charge of a man named Walker, who had charge of this installation, was, according to all report, literally vile, but Mr. Robert Priest, film director, finally got busy, and Mr. Walker is no more. Projection is now in charge of John Kieley, Fred Nostrand and Earl Rossman. I don't know Rossman, but I do know that both Kieley and Nostrand are good men, and presume Rossman is also. Certainly Mr. Kieley, working in conjunction with Mr. Priest, has accomplished wonders in improving matters, so far as the projection of the picture to the screen be concerned. A Minusa gold fibre screen has been installed, and the projection, everything considered, is now very good, and I might say remarkably good, when we take into consideration the fact that the picture is 24 feet wide and the tremendous handicap they have in the "coop," miscalled operating room, and its inadequate and poorly-arranged appointments. Yes, the operators are working under extreme difficulties, and the installation could only be made right by tearing the whole thing out and reconstructing it along lines of common sense. Then, too, the lighting of the interior of the auditorium is not well adapted to the presentation of moving pictures, and that still further handicaps the projection. There is too much light and it is poorly arranged.

The stage setting is splendid, but in my judgment the lighting scheme on the stage serves to very greatly detract from the picture. The effect is pretty, yes, but the picture is the main thing. A portion of the auditorium lighting is worse than bad. There is a row of red lights running clear across or around the balcony, and those seated behind these lights—well, I feel sorry for them. Also in the loge boxes, below, the three unprotected red lights, and these lights cannot but be annoying to those occupying the loge boxes. They should be white lights in an opalescent indirect lighting fixture.

In closing this article I wish to say that I am indeed sorry to be compelled to say these things about this installation, but it seems to me it is high time that a little good, hard truth be told. The installation at the Hippodrome would do no credit to even a five-cent, east side shoot-'em-through joint. The machines themselves, two Simplex, are all right. No complaint on that part. But that is about all there is right in the whole projection plant.

I wish to pay my compliments to Mr. Priest; he is a man of excellent ideas; a man who is striving hard to bring the Hippodrome pictures up to a high standard of excellence. The present operators, too, are entitled to credit, when everything is taken into consideration; they have done all one could expect them to do under the circumstances. I would by all means advise the Hippodrome management to tear that freak "coop" out bodily, and put in one twice its size, with double fuses for each machine and other up-to-date conveniences. Oh, yes, the arcs are controlled by two arc controllers, and that too is good.

Takes a Wallop.

From Toronto, Can., comes the following:

> Conditions here are very bad just now owing to the war hitting Canada pretty hard, and to the city authorities taking another wallop at the poor exhibitors by compelling them to put in stand pipes and fire hose, as well as wider aisles and better ventilation, and refusing all licenses until these various things have been complied with. Up-to-date there are a lot of houses which have not received their license. And now comes the city with an order that all the houses must have all their wires in conduit, which means that all the old wiring, such as knob and tube work, will have to be done over—more expense—and where one year ago the local could not get men to supply the demand, now it cannot get a man a job for love or money. Our prospects, therefore, are not the brightest. The managers in the non-union houses have—well I don't know what to call them—certainly not operators, working at the magnificent sum of eight and ten dollars a week, and they claim these men (?) are giving satisfaction.

It seems that whenever the city "authorities" run out of something to do, they put in the spare time figuring out new ways in which to soak the moving picture theater. The good Lord only knows the reason, but presumably because it is the poor man's show; also by reason of the fact that the average moving picture exhibitor is too poor to defend himself in expensive law suits, therefore he gets imposed upon by public servants (Servants is good! Ha, ha! Public bosses is nearer the mark) who swell up and "point with pride" at the things they have just done to "protect the dear peepul."

Might I suggest to the Toronto authorities a simple way to make the moving picture theater almost safe. Let them be built entirely of fire brick, with asbestos mortar, the walls and ceiling three feet thick and with a hollow space two feet across in the center of the wall and in the ceiling, the aforesaid hollow space to be filled with water, at say, twenty pounds pressure, and these walls so made that anything in the shape of anything more dangerous than a 6 c.p. incandescent lamp will instantly and automatically give them a tip and spill all the water into the theater. They might have boats for the people to sit in so they would not get drowned. I only suggest this because the moving picture theater is fearfully risky. It is an awfully hazardous proposition. Frightfully dangerous. I presume at a guess five million people a day attend moving picture shows in the United States and Canada—maybe more, but we will say five million—which would be 1,825,000,000 a year, and out of that number do you know that in the past ten years there have been probably as many as half a dozen actually killed in the moving picture theaters of the United States and Canada, and, terrible as that is, it might be added to by the further admission there has been an equal number injured. I am talking about fire, mind you, not panic, because all the standpipes in this broad, wide world won't stop a panic. I have a picture of the operating room of one of Toronto's best theaters before me as I write, and the absolutely crass stupidity of the Toronto authorities is aptly illustrated by the fact that in that picture the one absolutely most important thing to insure the safety of the audience is lacking, viz.: a rightly made, rightly-located operating room shutter fuse system. The Toronto authorities demand standpipes; they want all electrical wires placed in conduit, which latter is, of course, good practice, but they apparently have not brains enough to understand the simple little fact that the right thing for them to do, which is an entirely practical thing for them to do, is to prevent the audience from knowing there is a fire, should one occur. And that all hinges on a properly designed operating room vent flue and properly arranged and properly fused port shutters, combined with thoroughly fireproof operating room walls. For more than four years I have been pointing out to our brilliant (???) law makers, as well as to others, that it is an entirely practical thing to so arrange the operating room vent and front shutters, that reels of film may be burned in the operating room with but slight chance of any one in the audience knowing anything about it. But what's the use? Instead of installing properly made port shutters and so arranging it that they will be absolutely and entire automatic in their operation, they compel the poor exhibitor to pay out a lot of money for standpipes. When fire occurs in a moving picture theater you have got a swell chance to use a standpipe—I DON'T THINK! As soon as an audience finds out there is a fire, you have just about 3½ seconds in which to do anything, so far as that audience be concerned, and the fact that you turn a hose on that fireproof operating room would not prevent Mr. and Mrs. Audience from piling up in a heap. Its a shame that Toronto exhibitors should be handed this kind of a bundle, particularly at this time when business is very slack. As to the operating end of it, why if those eight and ten dollar men are giving satisfaction it is a rather sad commentary on the knowledge of projection possessed by Toronto exhibitors. The Toronto boys have my sympathy in their trouble. There is an element in the Toronto union which deserves little sympathy, but, nevertheless, I would not want to see even them get the worst of it. Suppose the owner fired one of those satisfied-with-a-ten-dollar-operator managers, and employed a ten-dollar-a-week manager, and then added insult to injury by saying, "he is fully competent and satisfactory." I w—o—n—d—e—r what the managerial gentlemen would say to that proposition. I w—o—n—d—e—r??

Guil Pastil, Graphite, Etc.

The following comes from the Picture Theater Equipment Company, 19 West 23d Street, New York City:

> From time to time I have noticed inquiries addressed to the projection department asking where guil pastil, graphite, etc., may be obtained. We beg to call your attention to the fact that we handle the guil pastil, which retails at $1.25 each, postage prepaid in the United States and Canada. We also keep in stock a very fine graphite, in powder form, which we retail at 10 cents per can. As soon as our new catalog is off the press we will mail you one for your files.

I am particularly glad to have this information about graphite. Graphite is a thing every operator ought to have, and use on his lamp, and there is now no excuse, because in those 10 cent cans is enough to last two or three months, if it is used economically. I would strongly advise every manager to send 10 cents to the Picture Theater Equipment Company and get a can of that graphite, and not only get it but use it on your lamp. It is the only thing to use for lamp lubrication.

Comments on the Films

General Film Company

THE CHILDREN'S HOUSE (Biograph), April 26.—Reviewed by Lynde Denig on page 397, issue of April 17.

ON THE DAWN ROAD (Essanay), April 26.—A one-reel drama by H. Tipton Steck, with a star reporter for the hero, a crime to be unravelled and a clever crook to defeat. Result: Plenty of action and excitement. Albert Roscoe, Lester Cuneo and Beverly Bayne head an excellent cast.

THE RING OF DEATH ("Road o' Strife" Series, No. 4) (Lubin), April 26.—This week's instalment of the Emmett Campbell Hall serial fully sustains the reputation which the preceding releases have won for the work. Alene's naive remarks have placed Abner Gray in a hazardous position, and, as usual, the spectator must bottle up his suspense for another week.

HEARST-SELIG NEWS PICTORIAL, NO. 33, 1915 (Selig), April 26.—Col Roosevelt and Wm. Barnes, Jr., at Syracuse, furnish interesting views of these two distinguished Americans. Performers from the Barnum-Bailey circus giving an exhibition at Bellevue Hospital; the Collier "Jason" bringing exhibits to the Panama-Pacific Exposition; Irish Volunteers in Dublin; opening of the Federal League Park, at Newark, N. J., and war pictures are the main items.

BOOBLEY'S BABY (Vitagraph), April 26.—Paul West has hit upon an original farce motive, and a rattling good one, in this one-reel of diverting nonsense. Sidney Drew is Boobley, and his wife plays opposite to him, a combination that is guaranteed to extract the last drop of mirth from any ripe and racy comic film.

THE IDLE RICH (Edison), April 27.—William Wadsworth and Arthur Housman are a pair of tramps in this one-reel comedy by Henry Beldon, which shows that a lot of fun can be had with the help of a $1,000 bill. An unusually amusing film.

THE PHONEY CANNIBAL (Kalem), April 27.—Another "Ham" comedy with an original conceit to start the laughs. Bud Duncan is very funny as the counterfeit cannibal, and Ham keeps pace with him as the phoney missionary. One reel.

PERCIVAL'S AWAKENING (Lubin), April 27.—Arthur Hotaling's one-reel comedy contains an old idea in an attractive new dress. Percival's awakening is the work of a woman, as usual, and her efforts make capital fun. Raymond McKee is excellent in the name part, and Frances NeMoyer plays Alice Burton with abundant life and humor.

A NIGHT GIVEN OVER TO REVELRY (Essanay), April 28.—A George Ade fable so firmly rooted in humorous fact that it is one continuous laugh. It will appeal especially to the male sex, but its keen and kindly satire will be relished by all. Charles Stine, Harry Dunkinson and Thomas Commerford lead the fun-feast. One reel.

THE VOICE OF EVA (Selig), April 28.—A romantic little drama of modern life, it is well off the familiar path, and is fairly entertaining. Virginia Kirtley's acting of the title role is of great assistance to the play. One reel.

THE BOARDING HOUSE FEUD (Vitagraph), April 28.—Billy Quirk is at it again, and another set of confiding victims become boarders at his boarding house. Much merriment is the outcome. Constance Talmadge is once more the object of Billy's affection. A one-reel Eugene Mullin farce, spiritedly produced by Lee Beggs.

FOOL'S GOLD (Biograph), April 29.—A one-reel drama that teaches an impressive moral, it shows how the lives of several men are sacrificed to their greed for gold. The scenes are laid in the far West. Walter Coyle, Ivan Christy, Joseph McDermott and Mary Malatesta are included in the well-selected cast.

THE UNDERTAKER'S UNCLE (Essanay), April 29.—The title belies the character of this one-reel farce—it is funny all through in a broad go-after-the-laugh-and-get-it fashion. Victor Potel in his old character of Slippery Slim, is up to his usual work, and Harry Todd, Ben Turpin and Margaret Joslin employ their comic gifts to the best advantage.

BY THE SEA (Essanay), April 29.—There is something new under the sun—in the way of comedy business. Charlie Chaplin proves this in the opening scenes of his latest comedy, a lively breeze being utilized to fan the audience into a gale of merriment. Only exteriors are used. Fifteen minutes of fun.

BUNKS BUNKED (MinA), April 29.—A familiar theme, but the action is never permitted to lag, owing chiefly to the efforts of Harry La Pearl. Aside from the fact that the exterior of the Bunk residence is hardly in keeping with the interior, the picture has been carefully filmed HEARST-SELIG NEWS PICTORIAL, NO. 34, 1915 (Selig), April 29.—Opening of the golf season at Van Courtlandt Park, New York; Daughters of American Revolution, at Washington; Sir Thomas Lipton and Red Cross Nurses in Belgrade, Serbia and views of the German Submarine U-36, off the Belgian coast, are several of the interesting news items in number 34.

STRICTLY NEUTRAL (Vitagraph), April 29.—With representatives of all the warring nations in the cast, Donald I. Buchanan manages to work up a lively and amusing row in his one-reel comedy. Flora Finch, Kate Price, Jay Dwiggins and the rest of the cast, enter the conflict armed with ability "and eager for the fray."

WHEN THE RANGE CALLED (Lubin), April 30.—There is one situation in this drama of Will M. Ritchey's that never happened, but it makes the spectators glow with satisfaction, nevertheless: where the cowboy millionaire drives out the throng of well-dressed parasites at the point of his revolver. A better than average drama, well acted by L. C. Shumway, George Routh, Velma Whitman and others in the cast.

AT THE MASK BALL (Selig), April 30.—This one-reel comedy does not depend on the novelty of its plot, but upon its rapidly changing scenes and spirited action. From the moment the leading character starts for the ball in a devil's costume there is the deuce to pay, a sneak thief taking a hand in the mischief-making. John Lancaster, Lyllian Brown Leighton and Wm. Scott are efficient principals.

THE-SORT-OF-A-GIRL-WHO-COMES-FROM-HEAVEN (Vitagraph), April 30.—Another of those smart comedies that hit off with good-natured dexterity a certain type of young woman well known to Broadway. There are, practically but two characters in the play, and they are acted to perfection by Earle Williams and Anita Stewart.

HIS CONVERT (Edison), May 1.—Reviewed by Louis R. Harrison on page 396, issue of April 17.

HIS POOR LITTLE GIRL (Biograph), April 30.—Gus Pixley in an emotional role is the novel feature of this one-reel drama. It is a simple little tale of a poor girl's experience at boarding school, and her love for her father. Rea Martin has the name part. Irma Dawkins and Jack Mulhall are also in the cast.

THE TIE THAT BINDS (Essanay), April 30.—Surrounded by an atmosphere of refinement and wealth, G. M. Anderson impersonates a gentleman whose wife has neglected him for the allurements of society. An abandoned child awakens her to a sense of duty. Marguerite Clayton is the wife. She assists Mr. Anderson materially in making the film effective.

A DOUBLE WINNING (Biograph), May 1.—An interesting but mildly-dramatic one-reel story of a bet. The hero wins, as a matter of course. He also wins a wife. Acting and photography are both excellent. The scenes are laid in the West.

THE BOX CAR TRAP (Episode No. 25 of the "Hazards of Helen" Railroad Series) (Kalem), May 1.—The usual quantity of honestly earned thrills and the breathless climax are found in this one-reel drama of life on the rail. The intrepid Helen again "does her bit" with the old cool assurance and splendid nerve control, and the story itself is interesting and novel.

THE HAND OF NAHAWEE (Jungle-Zoo Wild Animal Series) (Selig), May 1.—A one-reel romance of life in Africa, a feud between an Arab chief and a number of white settlers forming the dramatic foundation. The local color is convincing, and the acting of the cast uniformly commendable.

General Film Company Specials.

GREATER THAN ART (Edison), April 26.—Lee Arthur, who provided the scenario for this three-reel drama, has written a story of art-life abroad which will find favor with persons that favor well-seasoned romance. Mr. Arthur's work shows the hand of the practiced dramatist, and Director John H. Collins has filmed the photoplay with keen appreciation of its needs. Gertrude McCoy's personality and histrionic gifts find admirable expression in the role of Lavinia Santell, and Edward Earle, Duncan McRea, and their associates keep the performance at high grade.

THE HAUNTED HOUSE OF WILD ISLE (Kalem), April 26.—This two-reel mystery story, by Wm. B. Courtney, possesses the most essential quality in plays of its class—uninterrupted suspense. The climax is very dramatic, the exterior scenes beautiful, and the acting of John E. Mackin, Anna Nilsson, Robert D. Walker and Harry Millarde uniformly admirable.

LONELY LOVERS (Selig), April 26.—There is more truth than romance in this two-part drama of the domestic side of theatrical life. Maibelle Heikes Justice has not forgotten the significance of her name, in writing of people with whom she is evidently on familiar terms. An entertaining photoplay is the result. Wm. Stowell and Marion Warner are uncommonly well qualified for the brace of sweethearts.

ADAM BEDE (Biograph), April 27.—Reviewed by Louis R. Harrison on page 396, issue of April 17.

BLINDFOLDED (Essanay), April 27.—A detective play with a baffling crime that most spectators will find difficult to solve; high praise for such a drama. Edward T. Lowe, Jr., has shown much skill in building up this two-reel "thriller," and the producer has done his share of the work with equal aptitude. Richard C. Travers, Ernest Maupain, John Cossar and Nell Craig are as efficient as ever in their respective roles.

LADY OF THE LIGHTHOUSE (Vitagraph), April 27.—Reviewed by Lynde Denig on page 742, issue of May 1.

THE TATTOOED HAND (Episode No. 14 of "The Girl Detective" Series) (Kalem), April 28.—Hamilton Smith has made "The Tattooed Hand" one of the best of "The Girl Detective" series. The two reels are filled with lively situations, based upon a strong theme. Cleo Ridgeley, Arthur Shirley, Paul C. Hurst and Wm. H. West deserve commendation.

HER FATHER'S PICTURE (Lubin), April 28.—Mahlon Curtis has given his two-reel drama a very tragic finish. The climax is consistently led up to, however, and the story contains human interest; also a moral lesson. Velma Whitman, Dolly Larkin, L. C. Shumway and George Routh bring out all of its strong points.

A ROMANCE OF THE NAVY (Lubin), April 29.—Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush on page 569, issue of April 24.

POISONED BY JEALOUSY (Edison), April 30.—A romance of Italy and America, this two-reel drama has been produced in a thoroughly artistic manner by Langdon West. The plot does not invite profound thought, but moves entertainingly along the path dedicated to sentiment and leading to the union of a pair of loving hearts. Bessie Learn makes a pretty and demure peasant girl, and Harry Beaumont and Carlton King are praiseworthy as the two lovers.

THE DESTROYER (Kalem), April 30.—Reviewed by Hanford C. Jupdson on page 566, issue of April 24.

FRAUDS (Essanay), May 1.—Harry Sheldon has hit upon a new theme in this ably constructed three-part drama. The story deals with the Mann act, the hero being arrested for taking a girl into another state. He is innocent of any evil intention, but the unfolding of the plot throws a number of exciting episodes on the screen. Edna Mayo looks and acts the girl whose beauty and brains make an easy conquest of the manly young chap impersonated by Bryant Washburn with his accustomed satisfactory result.

A PILLAR OF FLAME (Vitagraph), May 1.—Norbert Lusk has built up a remarkably truthful domestic tragedy, made possible by a man's weakness and a woman's selfishness and head-strong will. The author has drawn no fanciful picture of Madeline Danby, who leaves her husband and child for a stage career; neither has he painted her in likable colors. The lack of firmness which the husband displays in permitting Madeline to come back and upset his domestic establishment, and thus bring on the tragedy, will also not endear him to an audience. It is a powerful two-reel drama, nevertheless. Norma Talmadge and Harry Morey could not be improved upon, and Producer Van Dyke Brooke deserves equal praise.

Mutual Film Corporation.

DO-RE-MI-FA (Keystone), April 15.—A Chester Conklin production, and a very good one. It is characterized by the rapid action that generally characterizes the Keystone product. The comedy man falls in love with a young woman whose lover is a singer. He tries to rival the efforts of the songster and gets into serious trouble.

AMBROSE'S NASTY TEMPER (Keystone), April 17.—Mack Swain is the comedian of this release, which is an exceedingly funny one. Plenty of rapid action of the most comical sort characterizes the film. The majority of the scenes take place in and about a factory, and the characters are, as would be supposed, all of the eccentric order.

MUTUAL WEEKLY, NO. 17, 1915 (Mutual), April 29.—Among the interesting items of this number are the sending of more troops to the front from Morocco. Carrier pigeons used by the French army, illustrations of the ruin and devastation wrought by the war, the dedication of the Strauss memorial, 20,000 bogus weights and measures being confiscated and destroyed in San Francisco, and old-fashioned negroes being baptized in the Mississippi River.

MOVIE FANS (Falstaff), April 30.—A slight comedy offering, showing how two young people meet at a moving picture theater. He dreams of becoming a great scenario writer, she of becoming an actress. Billy Sullivan and Lorraine Huling play the lovers. Rather pleasing for a light subject.

ETHEL'S DISGUISE (No. 22 of the "Bill" Series) (Komic), May 2.—Chapter 22 of the "Bill" series is a side splitter. This is really one of the best of the series. In it Ethel (Fay Tincher) undertakes to deliver some divorce papers. She disguises herself in male attire, and the things that happen in the restaurant where she drops in to regale herself, and where she eventually discovers him to whom the papers are to be delivered, are excruciatingly funny.

THE MISSION OF MORRISON (Reliance), May 3.—This subject is not without originality in its treatment. The story is of a young woman who is being forced to marry a count, who afterwards turns out to be a villain. She is saved from his clutches by Morrison who has been sent by the girl's uncle with a necklace as a wedding gift to the girl. Determined not to marry the count, she leaves home and takes a room at a hotel where the count follows and with the aid of an accomplice endeavors to break into her room. Morrison, happening on the scene, turns the tables on the count, and gains the girl for himself. The count is arrested and taken off to jail.

HER GRANDPARENTS (Majestic), May 4.—Dorothy Gish and W. E. Lawrence are featured in this truly delightful production, directed by Frank Powell. The story is just the same old story about the girl who elopes with the man from the city lured by promises of better things. This time, however, the girl falls asleep while waiting at the depot, and dreams of what will befall her grandparents, of whom she is the sole support, should she leave them. The subject has been very prettily treated, and the girl is rescued by her real lover just as the villain is pulling her on the train.

THE BABY (Reliance), May 5.—S. A. and C. M. Franklin have produced this picture with a cast composed principally of children. These children, by name, Baby Guerin, Olive Johnson, Violet Radcliff and Francis Carpenter, do exceedingly good work, but it is a question whether the production which has no particular fault as regards its technical make-up, has moral backing sufficient to recommend it as a picture for children to see. There would also be adverse comment on the baby being made to cry so frequently, which often appears to be from fright. We must confess, however, that without giving the matter serious thought, one would be inclined to enjoy the picture.

CASEY'S TRIBULATIONS (Royal), May 15.—There is little to commend in this low comedy offering. The Irish types are fairly amusing, but the action and poetical sub-titles do not contain any real humor.

Mutual Film Corporation Specials.

A CHILD OF GOD (Mutual Masterpicture-Reliance), April 29.—Scheduled as one of the big Mutual features, and founded on the story by Cyrus Townsend Brady, "A Child of God," made into a four-reel production by director Adolfi, has much within its makeup to please the ordinary spectator. Its moral is presented in a more strongly sentimental than practical manner.

THE HOUSE OF BENTLEY (Reliance), May 1.—An exceptionally attractive two-reel production directed by Lloyd Ingram, with Teddy Sampson, Cora Drew, G. A. Pearce and Frank Bennett in the cast. The house of Bentley risen to prosperity from humble origin was only brought to reason with regard to the marriage of the son of the house of Bentley by the interference of the grandmother, who brings Papa Bentley to time by relating to him the story of his own early life. The pretty stenographer (Teddy Sampson) with whom the son is in love, is then brought on the scene and taken into the bosom of the family.

THE COMEBACK (Majestic), May 2.—This is one of the few films that we come across that can boast of a good original plot. The production is in two reels and has plenty of consistent action, and no padding. The story is of a jealousy between the son and the stepson of an invalid. At the death of the invalid, when the will is read, it is discovered that the only recognition the stepson gets is in a clause which states that should the son die without an heir the stepson shall inherit his share of the fortune. The plan devised by the stepson to get rid of his rival, and to gain possession of his stepbrother's sweetheart is a novel one, the details of which would fill too much space to relate here. Suffice it to say that at this point of the picture the excitement is intense. "Billy" West, Elmer Clifton, Ralph Lewis and Jack Dillon are prominent in the cast.

HIS AFFIANCED WIFE (Broncho), May 12.—A two-reel number with George Fisher and Leona Hutton appearing as brother and sister, both thieves. The brother is captured but the girl escapes. After five years the brother breaks away from prison. The incidental scenes here are very good. Later he finds his sister employed in the office of a man whom she is to marry. The girl shoots her brother in defending the office from robbery. A very conventional plot, but strongly handled and leading up to a dramatic close.

THE SHOAL LIGHT (Domino), May 13.—A sea story with most of the scenes laid at a light house. The girl's father is discharged as keeper of the light after thirty years' service. Later the young captain comes and falls in love with the girl. The father does not like him, but he saves her life. Later the girl saves his vessel from destruction by turning on the light in a fog. There is considerable excitement and suspense in the latter scenes. Some of the incidents are familiar but the offering makes altogether one of fair strength.

THE HUMAN OCTOPUS (Kaybee), May 14.—An unusual story with Walter Edwards in the dual role of a politician and the leader of an organization of beggars. The hero, a young newspaper reporter, loves the politician's daughter, but the father does not like him. Later the hero discovers that the father is the notorious Hunchy Dolan. The scenes taken in Hunchy's den are full of interest and form the background of a new sort of crook story. After discovery the father goes to Europe and the hero marries the girl. Something new in the way of a slum yarn.

AN EYE FOR AN EYE (American), May.—Installment No. 2 of the continued photoplay, "The Diamond from the Sky." In this number Colonel Stanley has conspired with Dr. Lee to claim Hagar's son in order to claim the Stanley inheritance. He asks Dr. Lee to adopt his daughter, Esther. Hagar confronts the guilty colonel, who dies. These scenes are put on in a convincing way and lead up to Hagar's theft of Esther and Blair's killing of Dr. Lee when he takes the diamond. The characterizations are in good hands, Lottie Pickford, Irving Cummings, Wm. Russell, Heroge Periolat, Eugenie Forde and others appearing in the leads. The story is one of thrilling events which hold the attention closely.

THE ABSENTEE (Mutual Masterpicture-Majestic), May.—Reviewed in this issue by Louis Reeves Harrison.

RUMPELSTILTSKIN (Mutual Masterpicture-New York Motion), May.—Reviewed in this issue by Louis Reeves Harrison.

MONSIEUR NICKOLA DUPREE (Thanhouser), May 4.—A two-reel production resembling "The Devil" in plot, except that the sinister appearing individual in this part turns out to be an agent of good instead of evil. Ernest Ward plays the lead and is assisted by Florence LaBadie, Morris Foster and Harris Gordon. The story is that of a young artist watched over by a Frenchman of Mephistophelian appearance. The girl marries a millionaire, but later returns to her lover. The comedy is not seen in this until toward the close. It makes an entertaining offering. Numerous scenes are taken in Central Park.

A SCIENTIFIC MOTHER (Falstaff), May 7.—An original and laughable conceit in which a young mother raises her baby by scientific methods. He grows to be a giant in size and then in spite of her eugenic theories insists upon marrying a tiny girl. This gets to be very funny as the idea is worked out.

THE OLD SHOEMAKER (Reliance), May 8.—A two-reel story of somewhat melodramatic type, with Tote DuGrow, Jessie Buskirk and O. V. MacDiarmid in the leads. Billy falls in love with the daughter of an old Italian shoemaker. This arouses the jealousy of Luigi, played by Walter Long. Luigi and a pal abduct the girl and take her away to a cave. Billy and the father follow in an auto and recover the girl after numerous incidents of an exciting nature. A fire starts in the cave and the hero rescues the girl in the nick of time. The plot has not much originality but plenty of interesting action.

THE SONG OF THE HEART (Thanhouser), May 11.—A two-reel production amplifying an old theme which has been done many times in pictures. A young composer is robbed of his song by a man next door, who steals the melody and has it copyrighted. There is the usual love story and when the young composer is accused of stealing his own production the girl uses her wits in tracing down the criminal. Arthur Ashley and Mignon Anderson play the leads. The story, in spite of its familiar theme, is well-constructed and holds the interest of the observer.

RUMPELSTILTSKIN (Mutual Masterpicture Corp.), May.—A four-reel fairy story, apparently of German adaptation, from Grimm's Fairy Tales and other sources. Clyde Tracy plays the wicked dwarf, who stirs up all the trouble; Kenneth Browne and Elizabeth Burbridge appear as the Prince and the miller's daughter. The story is indeed beautifully presented and nothing could be desired in costuming or scenic effects. Many of the familiar tricks of fairyland are employed to keep things going; Simple Simon is turned into an enchanted pig, the miller's daughter is abducted and then found by the Prince-lover. A good fairy aids the pair with a magic carpet, and the dwarf is finally brought to a well deserved fate. A very delightful production of its type.

MAY BLOSSOM (Famous Players), April 15.—Reviewed by Lynde Denig on page 919, issue of May 8.

HELP WANTED (Morosco), April 29.—Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson on page 921, issue of May 8.

The Pathe Exchange Inc.

PATHE'S NEWS, NO. 32, 1915, April 19.—Interesting items of this number are the dedication of the Strauss memorial, the children of the New York hospitals guests of the management of the circus at Madison Square Garden, the Austrians in the trenches before Przemsyl receiving the blessing of the bishop and other important events.

IMA SIMP, GOAT, May.—In this number of his series, Ima Simp is cured of a chronic habit of yawning, by a transfusion of goat's blood. The result is that Ima Simp contracts thereby goat habits, which greatly inconvenience his friends. This is on the same reel with the "Bay of Ha-Long."

BAY OF HA-LONG, May.—On the same reel with the foregoing and unusually beautiful, showing ranges of barren mountains and unique rock formations, mirrored in quiet waters.

WHIFFLES AND THE EMPEROR, May.—This is an excellent comedy which presents a circumstance which we believe is new. Whiffles, after impersonating Napoleon in a moving picture, is treated to a call from his irate uncle, who has trouble in arousing him from a sound sleep. After being told that he is no longer the heir to his uncle's fortune he falls asleep and dreams of the real Napoleon, and falls out of bed just as he is being shot for insulting the emperor.

FROM OXFORD TO WINDSOR, ENG., May.—This subject on the same reel with "A Giraffe Hunt in Africa" and "Some Interesting Birds" takes us on a delightful trip along the Thames River, showing in beautiful photography the residences and villages along its banks, and ending at the picturesque edifice, Windsor Castle.

A GIRAFFE HUNT IN AFRICA, May.—On the same reel with the above and "Some Interesting Birds," this illustrates in a vivid manner which is further enhanced by tinting, how the giant giraffe is sighted and killed by the natives of Africa.

SOME INTERESTING BIRDS, May.—This is evidently a study of some of the birds of Europe. With its explanatory titles it will be an intensely interesting study, showing, as it does, birds on their nests, feeding their young, etc.

Pathe Exchanges, Inc., Specials.

THE NEW EXPLOITS OF ELAINE, EPISODE 4, May.—Under the title of "The Vengeance of Wu Fang," the 4th episode of the "New Exploits" lets us again into the secret of the whereabouts of Elaine, which proves to be in the home of the serpent, Wu Fang. Just as the Chinaman is flounting a knife before the face of the frightened girl with a suggestion that it is to be used to do away with her, a messenger arrives from Africa with a present for Wu Fang in the shape of a terrible insect whose poison inflicts fearful results on its victim. Elaine is then allowed her freedom while Wu Fang proceeds to torture Kennedy and Jamieson by placing the insect in the telephone, the consequence of which is that both are stricken with spirillum fever. This episode is intensely interesting.

WHO PAYS? (Series No. 5, "Unto Herself Alone"), May 10.—Reviewed on page 916, issue of May 8.

THE LADDER OF LOVE (Balboa), May.—Reviewed by Margaret I. MacDonald on page 922, issue of May 8.

United Film Service.

THE OTHER GIRL (Premier), May 7.—This two-reel production starts out in a rather novel manner, showing a man taking a book from his shelves and sitting down to read. The story then progresses—a story with a moral, by the way, after which we see the man close the book, rise and put it back in its place. The picture does not bring out the story very clearly, and it is somewhat difficult to grasp all of its significance.

CAN LOVE GROW COLD (Cameo), May 9.—Another of the "Dudley" series. Millicent Evans appears also in the cast of this number. Most of the fun in this picture has its origin in the fact that a doctor of the party makes a pill that is warranted to restore love. Several of them administered to various sorts of human beings bring about more or less affectionate demonstrations.

A COUNTRY LAD (Ideal), May 10.—A two-reel production with Dolly Larkin and George Larkin in the principal roles. The picture is a very acceptable one, but has employed the now rather over-done method of presenting a dream without giving warning. In this dream, however, there are some thrills that go far to make up for any discrepancy in the dream idea. Including the dream the production might be termed a comedy-drama. Some excellent comedy of the legitimate sort occurs in the early portion of the picture.

HOW ALLOPATH CONQUERED BONEOPATH (Luna), May 13.—This film is distinctly a burlesque on the Chiropractic method of treating disease by adjustments of the vertebral column. The attempt to be comic is too obvious and does not carry.

TOUGH LUCK (Starlight), May 13.—Aubrey and Kendig are featured in this picture, which is in some ways acceptable. There is some rather rough handling of a live goose which might not meet with favor generally speaking. There is the usual rivalry between the two hoboes who are still certain that the world owes them a living. The picture would be acceptable to some audiences.

THE STRONGER MIND (United), May 15.—A two-reel production which, in its finished condition, sub-titles, etc., promises to be unusually interesting. Pauline Bush plays the feminine lead, and as the woman whose courage and strength of purpose never failed her, she is beyond criticism. The story is of a man who was influenced by a bad companion to become a thief. He runs away eventually, and lands out west, where he tries to correct his methods of living. His former pal follows him, and the battle as to what the final result will be is won by the woman, whose mind is the stronger one.

Universal Film Mfg. Co.

THE TOLL OF YOUTH (Laemmle), May 9.—A eugenic story, written by Donald Meany, with a fresh note in the plot. The young man's father urges him to see the world before marrying. Later the father dreams his son cannot pass the eugenic test because of his fast life. But the close is happy. This is handled quite pleasingly.

UNCLE'S NEW BLAZER (Imp), May 10.—A comedy number, with Mrs. Chas. Craig, Wm. Garwood and Violet Mersereau in the cast. The photography is unusually good. The plot, in which the nephew creates jealousy by wearing his uncle's blazer, has a touch of light humor in it. This makes a fairly strong offering.

A SHOT IN THE DARK (Rex), May 11.—Ben Wilson and Dorothy Phillips appear as a young married couple. The wife meets a former friend and a shooting follows. The husband is presumably guilty, but as the plot works out the Hindu servant fired the shot. This is not powerful, but is handled in a way that holds the attention closely.

A STOOL PIGEON'S REVENGE (L-KO), May 12.—There is a lot of good action in this number, but unfortunately it has not enough plot to hold it together properly. Many of the incidents, such as the runaway trunk, are funny, but the plot should have been stronger to get the best results.

POKES AND JABS (Sterling), May 13.—The plot of this low comedy number is very much jumbled, though it is not very important. The incidents, of the knockabout sort, are rough but quite laughable.

A STRANGER IN THE CAMP (Victor), May 14.—An odd comedy number of fair strength. Brinsley Shaw plays an intoxicated gentleman who wanders into a lumber camp under the impression he has killed a man. There is some novelty in this and it is well-photographed, but the climax is not very strong.

NOTHING EVER HAPPENS RIGHT (Joker), May 15.—Ernie Shields and Queenie Rosson appear in this eccentric comedy. The young author plans to have some catastrophe happen to his willing wife, but she escapes everything providentially. The humor in this is fairly strong, but not convulsing.

FRAMED (Powers), May 15.—A western number featuring Sydney Ayres and Doris Pawn. The girl uses her wits to raise money to send to the mother of the man she loves. The story is somewhat conventional, but better pictured than usual and a little above the average in merit.

ANIMATED WEEKLY, NO. 164 (Universal), April 28.—Many interesting and instructive war scenes lead this number; numerous celebrations, observances and events in American cities are also shown.

Universal Film Mfg. Co., Specials.

THE BLOOD OF HIS BROTHER (Bison), May 8.—A two-reel combination of drama and out-door adventure, enacted by a cast including Rex De Rostelli, Wellington Payter, Marie Wolcamp, Sherman Bainbridge and others. The construction is faulty and somewhat obscure at times. The production is, however, at all times interesting. The photography is exceptionally good and the incidents and action generally are pleasing. Usually stirring is the train hold-up in which half a dozen men leap from the backs of their horses to the moving passenger train; this feature alone makes the production well worth seeing.

THE MASTER ROGUES OF EUROPE (Big "U"), May 9.—A three-reel photoplay of foreign make, telling a very entertaining story of a somewhat melodramatic type. A man and woman of criminal instincts are the leading characters. The blue and orange tinted film is attractive and restful to the eye The characters, scenes and incidents are different, which serves to hold the interest. The story of the misdeeds committed by these two is also well constructed, exciting and free from unpleasant features. The atmosphere is one of adventure rather than crime. It makes on the whole an enjoyable offering.

THE GIRL WHO HAD A SOUL (Victor), May 10.—A three-reel number suggesting the story of Oliver Twist, the principal character in this case being a girl, impersonated by Mary Fuller. Miss Fuller is seen at her best in this number. Mrs. Chas. Craig plays the female Fagin, in charge of a band of youthful crooks. The girl is injured and taken home by a young doctor, impersonated by Matt Moore. She falls in love with him and desires to reform. But the gang locate her and plan to draw her back into their clutches. The incidents throughout are well constructed and very sensational toward the last. A very strong production of its type. Curtis Benton is pleasing in a minor role.

THE TORRENT (Gold Seal), May 11.—Reviewed by Margaret I MacDonald on page 738, issue of May 1.

AN IDYLL OF THE HILLS (Rex), May 13.—A two-reel mountain story, with Pauline Bush, Wm. Dowlin and Lon Chaney in the cast. The opening situations depict the coming of a stranger into the district where an illicit still is operated. The girl is attracted by him. Later he is suspected of being a revenue man and by a curious turn of events his life is threatened by three guns in the hands of different people at the same moment. This situation is unique and lifts an otherwise ordinary production considerably in plot interest. There is also a surprise for the observer when it develops that he accidentally shot himself. Lon Chaney does a good piece of character work in this.

THE CORSICAN BROTHERS (Imp), May 14.—Reviewed by Margaret I. MacDonald on page 571, issue of April 24.

WHERE BRAINS ARE NEEDED (Big "U"), May 16.—A two-reel detective story, written by Murdock MacQuarrie who plays the role of an old sleuth just discharged because of his age. The yarn is one of the best in construction and general interest we have seen in some time of this character. It tells of a jewel theft by a chimpanzee; the detective's daughter is blamed and the old sleuth unravels the mystery in a logical way. A love story is also included. The photography is pleasing and the cast includes Laura Field, Agnes Vernon and M. K. Wilson. A good detective story.

WANTED—A CHAPERON (Nestor), May 7.—An Al E. Christie number in two reels, with Lee Moran, Victoria Forde, Eddie Lyons, Billie Rhodes, Jack Dillon and others in the cast. The story is a very breezy one and full of good light comedy touches. Lee Moran appears again in his masquerade as chaperon. Numerous funny situations arise and the observer is kept laughing throughout. When Eddie's real mother appears further complications are added. A good comedy subject.

THE SHIP OF HORROR (Universal Special), May 10.—Episode No. 10 of "The Black Box" serial.—Quest, the professor and their party, search vainly the Steamer Barton for Craig, who eludes them. A passenger dies mysteriously from poisoned coffee intended for Quest. Later all concerned in the story are found on the African desert and at the close of the second reel Quest and his friends are abandoned by Craig and the natives. This serial is moving along very absorbingly now and there are no doubt to be some surprises later along.

GOEBEL ORGANIZING NEW COMPANY.

President Otto E. Goebel, of the St. Louis Motion Picture Company, which produces the Premier Pictures appearing each week on the regular United Program, is spending a busy two weeks in New York getting a new company together for the exclusive production of single-reel pictures. The present Premier players, headed by Lillian Hamilton, Edythe Sterling and Frederick Church, are giving all of their attention to two-reel pictures, and Mr. Goebel has decided to double his forces so that he can increase the output of his studios by two releases a week. Two well-known directors are cooperating with Mr. Goebel in choosing his new artists, who will include a star of established reputation to be announced at an early date.

Good Pictures Coming.

Famous Players' Contribution to Next Paramount Quarter Includes Notable List of Stars and Celebrated Plays.

THE Paramount program for June, July and August will include ten of the strongest feature attractions ever yet produced by the Famous Players Film Co. Judged both from the personal attractive power of the stars and the national popularity of the plays, this company's list of forthcoming productions is indeed certain to be a veritable series of unusual successes. Exhibitors and photoplay fans throughout the country will be pleased to know that the program will release one Mary Pickford production a month. This phenomenally popular star will be seen in a notable characterization, "Rags," by the famous novelist, Edith Barnard Delano, to be released in June; in an elaborate picturization of Frances Hodgson Burnett's famous play, "The Dawn of a Tomorrow," to be issued in July; and in a typical portrayal, entitled "Little Pal," released in August.

Other stage artists who have become celebrated film favorites, through the medium of Famous Players productions, and who appear on its forthcoming program, are Marguerite Clark, Hazel Dawn, John Barrymore, and Pauline Frederick. Marguerite Clark will appear in screen versions of Madeline Lucette Ryley's celebrated comedy romance, "Mice and Men," and the noted stage success, "Seven Sisters." Hazel Dawn will appear in photo-dramatizations of "Clarissa" and the famous comedy triumph, "The Gay Lord Quex."

Pauline Frederick, who, through her amazing portrayal of Donna Roma in the Famous Players Film Co.'s greatest production, "The Eternal City," has been acclaimed as the foremost emotional artiste ever seen on the screen, will be presented in July in a powerful photoplay rendition of Herman Bernstein's great dramatic work, "Sold."

Besides the return of these favorites to the screen, the Famous Players Film Co. will in July introduce John Mason to the motion picture public in an adaptation of the international dramatic success, "Jim the Penman," by Sir Charles L. Young.

Edith Thornton, Unafraid.

WITH the return of the Superba Company from the south, where under the direction of Director Charles Hutchinson they have been making comedies for the United Program for the past few weeks, it was learned that Edith Thornton, "the prettiest little ingenue," and incidentally the youngest one of the Superba Company, had made a sensational flight in a hydroplane at Savannah, Ga., on Easter Sunday before thousands of people, who were held spellbound by the reckless daring of the girl.

Edith Thornton.

The pictures taken of Miss Thornton in the hydroplane will be a part of a one-reel comedy which has not yet been named, but which will appear soon as a part of the United Program.

"I was not a bit afraid to go up in the hydroplane," says Miss Thornton, "though Mr. Hutchinson and the other members of the company were so much more frightened about it than I was. We went up so slowly and beautifully, and when we got up high it seemed as if we were standing still and the whole world beneath us was moving."

Miss Thornton proved her fearlessness in more ways than one during the southern trip of the Superba Company. On the way home on the boat "Montgomery," she kept the passengers in constant fear of her life. She is an excellent gymnast, having received a thorough training in fencing, boxing, climbing and jumping under the direction of her father, and on the return trip, clad in midi blouse and bloomers, she climbed the rigging, swung out from the yard arms, jumped and ran to her heart's content, almost out-daring the sailors in her recklessness.

Seeing Vs. Hearing.

"Where one man can be reached by an appeal to the ear, a hundred can be reached through the eye. Man's soul is a city that hath gates; but if the ear gate is narrow, the eye gate is wide, and great caravans go trooping in thereat."—Rev. Newell Dwight Hillis, D.D.

NOT ONLY because men see a hundredfold more than they hear, but also because the pictured message is seen by hundreds, while the spoken message is scarcely heard by tens, it is easy to note that the supreme value of the message rests with the picture. The latest methods of child-culture is based upon the fact that the young child, comprehends with the eye often a year earlier than with the ear; that this principle holds good through life only enhances the value of the illustrated message. It is no new thought that the eye has precedence over the ear, but the wider truth that as that precedence is manifold greater, the power of giving and receiving is so considerably augmented that to cultivate this method of learning is to advance educational possibilities in a proportionate ratio.

The Everlasting Instructor.

While it has been well said "Of making many books there is no end," it was also said of this book learning, "Much study is a weariness of the flesh." To any one who could have predicted the possibility of study as easy as looking upon a simple illustration, and still further, that such illustrations should grow and proceed without end, there would no doubt have been much ridicule. The saying is true, however, that "realization is greater than expectation," and "fulfillment exceeds prediction." The most advanced and imaginative prophet could never have forseen the living, continuous and growing instructor. Teaching by the picture and the eye is pleasantly doomed to be everlasting. More certain than that there is no end to books is the assurance of the endless pictures. The thousands of miles of films which have already many times encircled the earth are but the beginning of this eternity of picture and eye combination teaching.

The Thorough Instructor.

The power of illustration is to give detail, depth and thoroughness impossible to speech and hearing. The sight conveys to the mind many things impossible of arriving there by any other means. Truly "great caravans troop in through eyegate," but they are troops of quality rather than quantity, details in masses, telescopically brought from the distance, microscopically extracted from inexhaustible depths. Revelation upon revelation, truth upon truth, wonder after wonder; the drop of water becomes an ocean, the insect an animal, the plant a forest, and the flower a living picture.

In wondrous thoroughness and detail the kinematographic method is destined to be the completion of every form of educative value, and the eye, hitherto man's greatest aid to receptive knowledge, is to see a future towards which the past has been but the kindergarten.

The Omnipotent Instructor.

No method of instruction has previously proved as all powerful as that method we are now studying. In combination with other accepted methods and by supplementing them, we have the all powerful instructor, nothing has yet appeared either to obstruct its progress or prove too difficult for its interpretation. A clergyman who is among those who have perceived this power, says: "There is a great power in these moving pictures, their influence and impressions are everlasting and overcoming; that they have come to stay is evidenced by their power to grow and their growth is power."

Successful Church Work.

The Christian World of February 25 has an elaborate article on successful moving picture work as conducted by churches. Naturally, the first and most prominent one is that in charge of Rev. C. F. Reisner in New York City. This church was until recently one of the "run-down churches" with a listless parish and a scanty membership. When Dr. Reisner saw the crowds standing in line at the moving picture houses he decided that it was time to conduct a church in a businesslike way, hence he coined the saying, "Religion has become a business," and "As long as competition is essential there is no use in evading it."

After installing the moving picture machine nothing but success has attended his efforts so that now his church is not only one of the most prosperous in the country, but the work it is doing is one of the most good to the people in that crowded community. The working classes numbering into thousands are enjoying the uplift of this church controlled picture work and Dr. Reisner has solved the two-fold problem of making a prosperous church besides benefitting a large company of people.

Three other churches have had a similar experience, one in New Jersey, one in Louisiana and another in Norfolk, Va. It is found that by using two senses instead of one (eyes and ears) a two-fold increase is immediately noticeable, and afterward this is again multiplied in many ways. This work in these and similar churches is now so growing as to demand a program control to arrange and classify its usefulness. The young peoples societies are taking up travel and scenic, the social workers of the church handle sociological subjects, the district visiting part is interested in industrial and similar films, while the bible school looks after the religious pictures and the entertaining branch of the church handles the general class of entertaining films.

The religious papers generally agree that when the old stereopticon failed by wearing itself out, the moving picture by its progressiveness has staying powers so that the church is more than justified in using them to their utmost capacity.

Many ministers and churches will be encouraged by the example and results of those mentioned and their great success is the assured beginning of a greater and wider field of usefulness.

The pictures of champions in which the leaders and "champions" in all kinds of athletic sports are to be presented, is destined to be a useful as well as an interesting film. If the "elevating of sports" is one of the desires of those in the athletic world, an exhibition of men who have excelled is one calculated to arouse ambitious youth to likewise higher attainments. One great good that will result from these pictures lies in the secondary fact that youths will be directed to those means of temperance and training, both physical and mental, whereby the champions exercised themselves to success. Attractive and interesting in themselves for young people everywhere, this film of the champions will have a wholesome effect.

Making and using of kitchen stoves by pictures is one of the latest industrial films. The Globe Stove and Range Co., Kokomo, Indiana, have had their entire factory, which is noted for its completeness, filmed from end to end. From the moment a huge electric conveyor, equipped with a powerful magnet, picks up the pigs of iron from the car, the work proceeds through every interesting and elaborate process, to the finished stories, a course at once interesting, instructive and entertaining to the intellectual mind.

A special series of pictures is being given in the large schools of Brooklyn and other parts of Greater New York. Three different companies are at work each evening in different parts of the city. Each entertainment consists of six reels of scenes from the Grand Opera of Richard Wagner and of his romantic life. Musical accompaniments, vocal and instrumental, render selections from Lohengrin, Parsifal, Rienzi, The Flying Dutchman, The Mastersingers and others. Children are charged ten cents and adults twenty-five cents. The profits going to school relief work.

How thoroughly religious bodies are taking to the moving-pictures is emphasized by the fact that a Layman's Missionary Film Co. has been organized in Atlanta, Ga.

The object is to film missionary fields and stations; it is interdenominational in character and is to be unlimited in its world-wide illustrative purposes.

Famous Players Engage Oscar Eagle.

FOLLOWING the engagement of the renowned film director, Sidney Olcott, the Famous Players Film Company has added Oscar Eagle, another noted motion picture director, to its producing staff. Mr. Eagle is one of the most prominent film producers and has in the past been responsible for the direction of a notable series of feature film successes. He was for two years at the head of the Chicago studios of the Selig Company, and prior to that was associated for many years with David Belasco, with whom he secured a national reputation as a stage director. He was also connected for a long period of time with the Liebler Company, for whom he produced many of the greatest dramatic successes sponsored by that theatrical firm. During his association with David Belasco, Mr. Eagle attended to the chief productions under Mr. Belasco's direct supervision, and took advantage of this association by stirring up a vast amount of dramatic knowledge learned from this wizard of stagecraft.

Oscar Eagle.

The first production to be directed by Mr. Eagle for the Famous Players will be John Barrymore in the celebrated adventurous romance, "The Dictator," by Richard Harding Davis. For this purpose Mr. Eagle, John Barrymore and an entire supporting company will sail for Cuba this week in order to obtain realistic atmosphere for this subject, in the exact locality in which its action occurs.

John Barrymore.

"The Dictator" is admirably suited to the inimitable methods of John Barrymore in delineating eccentric characters. The central figure of "The Dictator" is Brooke Travers, a young American, who is forced by existing and exciting circumstances to become temporarily the dictator of a small republic in South America, and who, in doing so, becomes a hero of many momentous and romantic situations, some comic and some very serious, indeed, from all of which he emerges the victor, through the aid of his clever wit and never-failing audacity, and is finally rescued by a kindly fate in the substantial guise of an American battleship.

This subject will be released some time in August on the Paramount program.

UNITED EXCHANGE FOR SIOUX FALLS, S. D.

Under the experienced hand of W. L. Merrill, manager of the United Film Service for Minneapolis, Minn., the new United Exchange for Sioux Falls, S. D., has been firmly established and placed under the able management of G. M. Hecklin. Mr. Hecklin is well known in his territory, having been manager of the Sioux Falls Exchange of the Mutual Film Corporation.

Lichtman Opens Booking Office.

Founder of Alco Creating a Method of Direct Contact Between Producer and Exhibitor.

AL. LICHTMAN, who founded and organized the Alco Film Corporation, and more recently general manager of the Select Booking Agency, has severed this connection in order to establish a direct method of contact between important producers and exhibitors.

Mr. Lichtman had hoped that the ideals he has harbored for a long time toward a more general unification of interests between enterprising feature producers and exhibitors would reach a successful culmination through the Select Booking Agency, but that organization's recent affiliation with the Paramount Program obviated all possibility of the development of an independent booking system that would depend only upon the merits of the individual productions distributed through it, and the relative importance of the theaters in which they will be exhibited.

Al. Lichtman.

Mr. Lichtman has opened offices in the Times Building, New York, and it is his intention to align a number of important theaters throughout the country with whom he will arrange to book as many feature attractions as can be obtained that will conform to the highest existing standards. Mr. Lichtman is confident that, with the number and prominence of the theaters with which he is now negotiating for this booking privilege, he can, within a short time, impress the leading feature producers of the world with the desirability of this plan of distribution, and that he will be enabled to offer them greater incentives for the production of more meritorious subjects than is at present the vogue.

In Mr. Lichtman's judgment, when the leading feature producers realize that an important chain of theaters are booking features through one central office, they will be prepared, regardless of their present program affiliations, to issue through his offices their most notable attractions, because of the wider commercial possibilities these subjects would possess, distributed and exhibited individually in a circuit of select theaters.

From years of observation and analysis of distribution conditions, Mr. Lichtman contends that the greatest fault in program distribution is the fact that all subjects, though varying in attractive and pleasing power, are placed on the same average of importance and consequent receipts. This makes it impossible for any single production of unusual merit to command the artistic and financial success which it deserves.

Mr. Lichtman explains that his plan is not in any degree to create competing standards with the programs now in circulation, but is rather designed to assist exhibitors who require special attractions from time to time to secure them in the most effective and methodical manner, by supplying the proper incentive for producing special feature attractions to the manufacturers. It is this plan of co-operation between producers and exhibitors for which Mr. Lichtman has organized the Al. Lichtman Film Booking Agency, believing that the necessity for feature programs has been greatly minimized by the number of feature producing alliances now in existence.

Mr. Lichtman's long training in feature distribution and the years of study he has devoted to this branch of the industry enables him to anticipate the fluctuating conditions that have always characterized the feature business and to be prepared for any changing tides of the trade currents. The intimacy he possesses with a large number of the foremost exhibitors in the country and the confidence they have always reposed in him and his ideas, will undoubtedly provide added factor in the possibilities for success which he already possesses.

Music for the Picture

Conducted by CLARENCE E. SINN

A BIG PIPE ORGAN with two, three or four manuals (key-boards) is a magnificent instrument. When all is said there is no other instrument so fitted for the perfect accompaniment of moving pictures—provided, of course, an artist is available who is willing to remember he is not in a church, but a theater, and play to the pictures.

I said it is better fitted for a perfect accompaniment. That statement I will qualify by saying more perfect as to detail as well as musically. To my mind a good orchestra when it is handled right will give a more satisfactory interpretation musically; but not as to detail work. Good orchestras, however, are both rare and expensive, and the "four-piece bunch" is the limit in number for the average picture house.

I know I will be criticised for placing the orchestra before the organ. It is only a personal opinion and open to argument; and remember I refer to "a good orchestra handled right," which gives me lots of margin. Frankly speaking, though, it is a sad fact that a satisfactory organist can be found (or made) much easier than can a satisfactory orchestra leader for picture work. But if conditions were equal (which I admit is not the case) I should place our musical accompanists in the following order:

The Orchestra—Best in tonal coloring; weak in detail work.

The Organ—Good in tonal coloring, perfect in detail work.

The Piano—Weak in tonal coloring, perfect in detail work.

The orchestra is expensive—but it pays in certain localities. The organ is more expensive than the orchestra (for the first few years at any rate), but hundreds of exhibitors have found it a paying proposition in certain localities. Others have found it a costly experiment which, unlike the orchestra, cannot be got rid of by a two weeks' notice. It takes a long time to instal a pipe organ, and when it is finally installed it is supposed to "stay put." It costs a lot of money, too, and just now the salaries of good organists are high. However, a good picture pianist can, in a very short time, pick up enough to "get by" with the organ for a while; after that it is merely a matter of practice. And where is the picture pianist who wouldn't be delighted to exchange his piano for an organ—or at least, to alternate one with the other.

If a real pipe organ could be produced—not a toy, but a real organ—which didn't cost so much, which didn't have to be built into the house, which could be moved in or out without much bother—a lot of exhibitors would sit up and take notice. Why couldn't a good organ be made with only one manual or key-board. Your organist friend will tell you of course that such an instrument would not be so satisfactory as a two, three or four manual organ. This is true. Your orchestra leader would also tell you that a four-piece orchestra was not nearly so satisfactory as one of ten or twenty men. Both would be right. But how about the man running a little house, who realizes that good music is a valuable business getter, but cannot risk the great expense of installing an organ—or even an orchestra. Must he put up with a piano when he would rather have something better? There are one-manual organs made—not many, it is true—but plenty good enough for picture theaters. Supposing you had one and took out the front (including the key-board) then backed a piano up against it and attached the piano keys where the organ keys were attached. I mean, fix it so the piano keys would do the work formerly done by the organ keys. It could be done by electricity, couldn't it? you could thus have a piano and a genuine pipe organ played from one key-board. You could make your organ as big or as small as your pocketbook would stand.

You could have one set or two sets or fifty sets of pipes if you wanted to. You could have chimes, and pedals for the feet. You could even have a box of "traps" and sound effects like the combination instruments have. Don't you think this could be done, and that it could be gotten up at less expense and trouble than could a pipe organ? I do. It is being done right here in Chicago.

I mentioned the "Harmo Electric" some time ago after a visit to their factory, and promised you something more about it when I had actually seen and heard a demonstration of it. Since then an instrument has been placed in the "Verdi" theater, where a capable organist is demonstrating its possibilities. It is simply a good pipe organ attached to a piano key-board—a one manual organ. It has a good set of pedal notes (these of course are played with the feet) and a set of chimes. In addition there is a chest of "sound effects" for those who care for them. It seems to me this is about the last word in combination instruments—for it is a combination instrument, being an organ attached to a piano. But it is something more than a couple of octaves of medium size pipes. This particular one contained something in the neighborhood of 300 pipes; six stops and the pedals (which last are of course played with the feet). With the combination thus afforded the demonstrator did about all that is usually required of any pipe organ in a picture theater. Like many other good things it comes forward at the precise moment when conditions have made such an instrument particularly desirable.

What Shall I Play?

J. W. D., Minneapolis, Minn., Writes an interesting letter which is too long to print in its entirety, I am sorry to say. Here is the gist of it:

> No one will dispute your repeated advice "play the pictures." Sure thing. But how, when and where? Every man who is interested in this gosh darned business wants to—except the orchestra leader. He tears children from their weeping mothers to the tune of "Everybody's Doing It," and when you implore him to play serious music for serious scenes he innocently has the villain throw the hero from the trestle to the strains of "Oh Promise Me That Some Day You'll Be Mine." It is certainly horrible and unpleasant when you have your money tied up in this business to have a perfectly new, highly recommended leader ask you after the first tryout of the pictures given for his benefit: "Was that last reel a comedy?" You can help every one of the long-suffering managers by specific information as to suitable music. You have frequently supplied this for certain features and it has been of great service. Now, can't you and all you intelligent musicians who know what is required supply us with a list of music properly classified so that we can direct Senor Henbraino what to play. Even the classification would be of much service as a guide for the proper distribution of music that may be on hand. The first task will be to frame up a list of different situations requiring different musical treatment. Just as a suggestion, more with the idea of explaining the scheme than with the intention that it should be used, I submit the following:
> GRIEF.—Farewell between lovers. Parting of mother and child. Farewell to home. Death-bed scenes. Recovery of bodies. Poverty. Religious scenes of pathetic nature.

The writer also includes classification under these heads: "Strongly dramatic; mysterious and weird; miscellaneous." I have shown one example only as an illustration of the idea.

Now the idea of classifying music according to its dramatic character is not a new one. We are continually doing it in a very small way (in one form or another) in this department. Every time the musical accompaniment for a picture is given here, it is intended as a help to those who don't know—but can learn. For the Senor Henbraino's, I am afraid there is no help. When a person cannot tell the character of a picture when he sees it, he has no place in a picture theater orchestra. If he is utterly devoid of judgment, tell him in advance which are the comedies and which dramatic. And don't let him play an overture, operatic selection or medley of any kind in the dramas. The injudicious use of such numbers is as much the cause of incongruous music as any one thing. They are made up of contrasting movements—slow movements, lively movements and moderate. The chances are always that these movements do not occur at the same time with slow, lively or moderate action in the play. The percentage is in favor of the slow movement in the music occurring simultaneously with the rapid movement in the picture and vice versa. Let your leader play descriptive music (pathetic, lively, agitated, weird, etc.) only in the most obvious scenes. Let him fill up the intervals between with something non-committal—waltzes without the coda; intermezzi; caprices; allegretto movements—single movement concert pieces generally. There is not sufficient space at present to go into the subject as thoroughly as it deserves, but it will be taken up again.

The Music Supply Co. (San Francisco, Cal.) has issued a little pamphlet which should interest J. W. D. It is compiled by Lyle C. True and is a list of about one thousand titles of various musical numbers, all classified and labeled, according to their respective dramatic suggestions.

Sidney Drew

THAT Sidney Drew, the star comedian of the Vitagraph Company, would become an actor became evident from the time he first began to take notice of things some forty odd years ago. Coming from a long line of ancestors, who, on both sides of the family, were recognized artists on the legitimate stage, it was but natural the offspring of such talented parents would adopt the stage as the work best suited to him.

Mr. Drew was born in New York City on August 28th, 1864. His father, John Drew, was born in Dublin, Ireland, and his mother, whose maiden name was Louisa Lane, in London, England. As Mrs. John Drew she was one of the most celebrated comediennes this country ever had.

Sidney Drew.

Mr. Drew received his education at the Episcopal Academy, University of Pennsylvania, and began his stage career in Philadelphia, his first professional appearance being at the South Broad Street Theater with Leonard Grover in "Our Boarding House." His recognition as a master of light comedy was instantaneous and his rise to prominence was rapid. As leading man for Charles Frohman and in support of such well known players as Rose Eytinge, Ada Dyas and other prominent stars of the period, he further increased his popularity. Organizing a company of his own, he presented such comedy successes as "The Rivals," "The Road to Ruin," and "A Jealous Wife," his mother being associated with him in these various ventures.

During the theatrical season of 1896-1897, Mr. Drew turned his attention to vaudeville, then becoming a recognized factor in the amusement world, and was the pioneer in presenting legitimate drama on the vaudeville stage.

Two years ago Mr. Drew became interested in motion pictures and made it his business to investigate the possibilities of this new form of amusement. As a result of his investigation he became a member of the Vitagraph Stock Company and registered an immediate success. The first picture in which Mr. Drew appeared was "The Still Voice," and his first big success, the two-part feature, "A Regiment of Two." Mr. Drew not only plays the leading characters in all his pictures, but is the directing producer and turns out an average of one picture a week, an exceptional record even in these times of rapid production. Comedy is Mr. Drew's forte and while every picture in which he has so far appeared has met with success, his best liked photoplays include "A Professional Scrapegoat," "The Hair of Her Head," "Auntie's Portrait," "The Home Coming of Henry," "The Combination." "The Hypochrondiac," "Cupid's Column," "When Dumbleigh Saw the Joke," "Boobley's Baby," and many others.

CHANGE IN V. L. S. E. TERRITORY.

The Vitagraph-Lubin-Selig-Essanay, Inc., report an important change in the territory covered by the Chicago and Kansas City branches. The Chicago branch has been relieved of the State of Minnesota and the exhibitors of the State will be served hereafter by the Kansas City office, at Boley Building, 12th and Walnut streets, in charge of E. R. Pearson.

Marguerite Snow With Metro

THE engagement of noted stars and transference of personalities from one company to another have been so numerous this season that one or more moves are almost commonplace. Especially active and prolific in engagements have been the Metro Pictures Corporation, and the acquisition of one or more stars a day has almost been the routine for that firm. But the engagement by Fred J. Balshofer, head of the Quality Pictures Corporation, of the tremendously popular and widely known Thanhouser star occasions more than passing interest, for during the six months agone Marguerite Snow has leaped into great vogue by reason of her exceptional abilities and magnificent costuming of the leading female role in "The Million Dollar Mystery" and her joining the Metro Organization comes as quite a surprise.

Marguerite Snow.

Marguerite Snow will play the leading roles opposite Francis X. Bushman in the productions of the Quality Pictures Corporation which will be released one every six weeks on the Metro Program. Miss Snow, for the past five years one of the principal stars of the Thanhouser Film Company at New Rochelle, is perhaps one of the best known motion picture stars among the two-score who have attained universal popularity.

Born in Salt Lake City, twenty-three years ago, Miss Snow made her first appearance at the age of fifteen in an amateur performance for the benefit of the Loretto Heights Academy, Denver, Colo., where she was a student. Miss Snow has long been an admirer of Francis X. Bushman, and it is with the consent of her husband, James Cruze, that she assumes the principal role opposite Mr. Bushman. Mr. Bushman and Mr. Cruze are extremely good friends and quite a few wires passed between them before the deal was consummated.

Miss Snow leaves for Los Angeles May 6 in the four-car special train engaged by the Quality-Metro organizations and will take her Mercer runabout, eighteen trunks of costumes and the Belgian seamstress whom she has adopted and whom she will put in charge of her wardrobe on arriving at the Quality Pictures studios.

The first appearance of Mr. Bushman and Miss Snow together will be in "The Second in Command," Mr. Frohman's former stage success, which will be released the latter part of June on the Metro Program.

ESTABROOK HONORED.

It is quite a distinct honor that has been bestowed on Howard Estabrook, the star of "Four Feathers," "Officer 666," "M'Liss" and "The Butterfly." If you are conversant with the legitimate productions that have graced the boards of Weber's theater during the last five or six years, you will recall the production "Mrs. Avery," which was written by Howard Estabrook. Because of the success of the production, Mr. Estabrook has been elected into the American Society of Dramatists, which numbers among its list of members all the prominent playwrights of the contemporary period. He was proposed by Mark Swan and seconded by Channing Pollock.

SMALLWOOD IN NEW OFFICES.

The Smallwood Film Corporation has removed its executive offices from the Flatiron Building to the Knickerbocker Theater Building Annex, 39th street and Broadway. Within the next few weeks Smallwood will begin releasing its new brand through the United Film Service under the name of "Pyramid Pictures," featuring Edwin August supported by Ruth Blair as leading woman and by Iva Shepard and Bill Bailey. Regular weekly releases of two-reel subjects will be made.

Bernstein Announces Plans

TO SET at rest all idle rumors and definitely declare my policy of activities in the moving picture industry for the future, I wish to make the following statements:

Plans are already under way for the manufacture of a fourth program consisting of one, two and three reels, interspersed with one special feature of five reels and upward in length per week. Quality will be the keynote of all these productions, and the special features will be selected on account of their uniqueness, strength and entertaining qualities.

Isidore Bernstein.

Popular books, and especially plays of note have been utilized so extensively of late that only indifferent material is left in the discard. My organization will be fortified with writers who will construct the photodrama along the dignified and painstaking lines found so necessary upon the legitimate stage, the special features giving opportunity for entering into contracts which will reimburse the dramatist sufficiently to place at our disposal the best writers in the field of entertainment. Drama will not be all drama. Tragedy and tears will not become monotonous by surfeiting the entire story with their qualities. Instead, drama and tragedy will be constructed with bright spots and laughs which give relief and lighten the action, and which have proven so essential upon the legitimate stage.

I am in possession of certain recent inventions fully protected, which will give me a decided advantage over the manufacturers of yesterday, and everything will be constructed upon a new and up-to-date basis. Having no junk in sub-cellars to unload and no unwise contracts to operate under, I will have a free and untrammeled hand in the manufacture of only the latest and best in the photodrama field.

Future plans include a system whereby the exhibitor will be able to arrange his program to such advantage that a superior product will be less costly than present-day existing arrangements. This is an age of the survival of the fittest, and being equipped with the experience of the last few years and backed by a group of financiers who are not connected in any way with the photoplay or theatrical business, I am in a position to revolutionize certain phases of the moving picture industry, and if the moving picture fans of tomorrow do not think they can support four programs, then I can say, safely and without egotism, that mine will be one of three doing business.

My greatest worry at the present time is to get away from telephone and telegraph communications, and endeavor to yank a five-pound trout from the waters of San Gabriel River.

Sincerely,

I. BERNSTEIN.

HEAD OF ALLIANCE RETURNS.

Andrew J. Cobe, President of the Alliance, has returned to New York from a two weeks' trip during which he visited nearly all of the Alliance exchanges east of Duluth.

"I made it a point," said Mr. Cobe, "in every city that I touched to visit one or two of the leading theaters. Out of twenty houses which I entered fifteen were using the Alliance Program, of which seven were playing "Beulah."

"The shortage of good features was the fact that impressed me the most. The picture loving public will not tolerate anything but the best, and they are willing to pay the right price."

MRS. COBB'S EDUCATIONAL PICTURES.

Agnes Egan Cobb has signed up Tom Moore for his circuit of theaters to serve him with her educational subjects which are becoming so popular. Mrs. Cobb claims she has more business that she can possibly attend to and states they are as famous and as much in demand as the Charley Chaplin comedies.

Jay Morley, Lubin Player.

TO MISQUOTE a well-known sage, some are born prominent, some achieve prominence, others have prominence thrust upon them. Inasmuch as Jay Morley, the subject of this sketch, has been going his unobtrusive way for the past two years in "pictures," signs his name just plain American, and has never been featured in the "scandal" columns, he must be classed in the second category, that is, that he has achieved, etc.

Jay Morley.

Mr. Morley is a conscientious, retiring chap that prefers to let his work on the screen speak for itself. His diffidence is an admirable quality exceedingly rare in this day and age of "24 sheets" and "bobbed hair," but there are times when a merited word of praise is not amiss.

His face is familiar to many picture fans for he has appeared in Mutual, Universal, United and General Programs. He is at present playing leads with the Western Lubin forces of Captain Melville under the direction of Leon Kent. This is an harmonious combination, for Mr. Morley has absolute faith in his director and in the latest releases of this company he has done his best work.

Snap and vim have been the watchwords of his advance. No stunt is too hazardous to daunt his spirit and his earnestness in all things is the delight of his director and his fellow players. Incidentally three more two reelers from the pen of Tom Gibson have been purchased by Captain Melville in which Mr. Morley will play the leading roles. "Study and conscientious work," says Mr. Morley, "has gotten me this far, and more study and conscientious work is going to get me further"—and we believe him.

GRIFFITH RETURNS TO LOS ANGELES.

D. W. Griffith, filmdom's foremost producer, has arrived at the California studios of the Reliance and Majestic companies, of which he is director in general. As yet he is undecided as to what his next subject will be for a Griffith feature.

Mr. Griffith has been in New York and Boston attending the opening of his latest spectacular photodrama, "The Birth of a Nation," and he reports wonderful progress.

No sooner had Griffith arrived than he plunged right into work by supervising the productions of some of the Reliance and Majestic releases. Mr. Griffith will probably remain in California until after he has completed his next feature and then perhaps he will arrange for its New York premier.

GETTING REAL FIGHT PICTURES.

Claude Patin, Secretary-General of Eclair, this week gave out the interesting information that H. Maurice, technical manager of the famous Paris Film Company, is now serving at the front in the capacity of sergeant with a leading French Aviation Corps, and fully equipped with a motion picture camera and telescopic lenses, will take many thousands of feet of the actual warfare and fighting. Mr. Maurice is absolutely the first man to be granted such a privilege and Mr. Patin confidently expects to shortly startle the American public and exhibitor with films of war in all its reality and horror.

MITTENTHAL BROTHERS MOVE.

The new executive and main branch of the Mittenthal Brothers Film Company, which is being built in connection with their studio at Herrito and South Waverly Streets, in Yankers, is now completed, and was occupied by the firm on May 1st. The company will discontinue their New York office in the World's Tower Building on Fortieth Street, so that both of the brothers may be close enough to the studio that they may supervise the making of Starlight Comedies for the United Program.

British Notes

THE action of the Government in restricting the opening hours of hotels and saloons is having one reflex in the increasing prosperity of the moving picture exhibition. Particularly is this reaction noticeable in our large industrial cities where drinking hours have been considerably curtailed and where after 9 or in some cases 10 o'clock at night the only houses open are the picture houses, the theaters and unlicensed cafes. In one provincial city this newest restriction of the military authorities has so materially swollen the patronage of the principal moving picture theater that the directors have acquired, at a price that a month ago they would have considered outrageous, adjoining premises for extension. It is fortunate that the moving picture exhibitor in Britain has not sought to imitate the ordinary theater by opening saloon bars upon his premises and it has been a matter of mild astonishment with not a few men of position in the industry that the association of a leading brewer with the leading exhibition circuit has had no ulterior significance. In political circles it is feared that some form of temporary total prohibition is imminent. If any such proposal matures, and our country follows, even if only temporarily, the lead of Kansas, it will be interesting to note what amount of increased business falls the way of the picture theater. From indications already available it seems that the only alternative to the saloon is "the pictures."

A patron's carelessness in leaving a live cigarette stump on the carpet cost the owners of the Wood Green (North London) Picture Palladium considerably over $100,000 last night (April 8th). Every part of the place was razed to the ground by fire except the operating box, which, thanks to the skill and thoroughness of its construction, was preserved with its films untouched.

C. Henry Keenton, the well known natural history kinematographer and adventurer is again about to depart for the African wilds, but this time upon a more ostensibly serious project. WHARTON'S NEW STUDIO.

Wharton, Inc., recent producers of the "Exploits of Elaine" series, are practically ready to take possession of their new studio at Renwick Park, at Ithaca. Through co-operation of the Industrial Commission of that city a tract of land of forty-five acres at the southern extremity of Cayuga Lake has been set aside for the Wharton Company. Two pavilions, a big water tower and outdoor airdome and a boat landing of 400 ft., supplied with over 200 boats, are a part of the equipment. An outdoor stage is being constructed and the pavilions are being arranged for protection against the elements. Handsome dressing rooms are being installed and the entire plant will be completed ready for occupancy by May 15.

The progress made by the Wharton company has been remarkable. It is not so very long ago that this company began operations at Ithaca, but its growth has been steady, especially since the Wharton Brothers became so closely linked with the Pathe productions.

Edward Jose, Independent Producer

EDWARD JOSE, who as an actor in moving pictures, is probably as well known as any player in America, has entered the field of independent producers and will shortly release, through Pathe, an exceedingly elaborate picturization of Edward Locke's famous novel, "The Beloved Vagabond." For the first time in his career, Mr. Jose will not have a part in his own production, but has secured the services of Edwin Arden as the star of the cast. Miss Bliss Milford will play the principal woman's part.

Edward Jose.

Mr. Jose's advent as a producer follows closely on the production by him, of what, up to this time, had been his greatest work, "The Resurrection," the scenario of which, from Tolstoi's novel, was not only made by him, but was under his direction, and in it he also played one of the principal parts. His resignation from the staff of the Fox company followed immediately after the completion of this picture.

Mr. Jose will use the Pathe Studio, in Hoboken, for his productions, and all his releases will be through the Pathe Freres. He was for some years the leading man for the Pathe and his work in "The Stain" is remembered by all movie patrons. He achieved a national reputation through his marvelous rendition of the leading role in "A Fool There Was." He was for many years on the legitimate stage, taking German, French, Spanish and English speaking parts in all the European countries, as well as America. Work has been begun on "The Beloved Vagabond" and its release will be announced shortly.

Gertrude Selby

GERTRUDE SELBY had never been in pictures before joining the L-KO Company, but had been on the stage for three years, from the time she was fifteen until she reached the exciting age of eighteen. For two seasons musical stock was her pastime, after which she was with Gus Edwards. This was followed by an engagement in vaudeville, touring the country. Now she is very happy in the fine Hollywood L-KO studios, with the greatest film-comedy company in the world. She said:

Gertrude Selby.

"I feel that playing in the pictures is an ideal outlet for any one possessing ability, whether it be in the dramatic or the comedy field. Stage work is very interesting, but does not compare with the opportunities presented in the film world. Every week we are called to play another role. This makes for broad experience, and I have a secret hope that some day I may be called upon to play "reel" serious parts. I am very glad of my success with the L-KO Company and I feel that we have only commenced. Billie Ritchie is the greatest comedian on earth. We have more fun rehearsing and playing our scenes than you can imagine. His wit and humor is so spontaneous that at times we are compelled to stop until we recover our equilibrium."

Paramount Theater, Newark, N. J.

Magnificent Picture House Charges 15, 25 and 50 Cents Admission—Big Elite Patronage.

FEW people, outside of motion picture enthusiasts, in Newark, N. J., are aware that on Broad street, that city, is one of the most magnificent motion picture palaces in the country. The house recently celebrated its half year anniversary and has every reason to be proud of its increase in business.

The Paramount is located some distance from the real center of the City of Newark and when the present lessees took hold of the house they were told by theatrical men that it would be an impossibility to make the theater pay. The lessees secured Tali Esen Morgan, a director of music at

Paramount Theater, Newark, N. J.

Ocean Grove, N. J., to manage the theater and today the house does a capacity business. The magnificence of the house is immediately noticeable. There is nothing to hide the grandeur of the building from the outside, as it stands alone. The architecture is extremely artistic and undoubtedly detail was given much thought in the construction. On the outside of the building above the entrance are the words cut in stone, "Whatever You Do, Do It Well." Peculiar as it may seem the Paramount is an upstairs house and for this reason many dubious ones said that the place would not pay. The management proceeded to make the vast lobby probably the most attractive in the country. The public was so impressed with the lobby that they did not balk at walking one flight up to the orchestra floor. The box office is located between the two sets of doors, the small lobby being entirely of marble. The first lobby is exquisitely finished. The exit stairway is a reproduction of the staircase in the Congressional Library. It is the first thing that attracts the eye. Along the wall of the small lobby for a distance of a hundred feet are oil paintings of Paramount stars. Two life size paintings of Mary Pickford, also, grace the lobby.

The picture frames and chandeliers are tastefully decorated with greenery and leaves and palms are placed artistically. In the rear, on the right of this lobby is the office cleverly hidden between marble benches and dark red screens. On the floor of the first lobby are four immense rugs, the colors blending with the decorations. The second lobby is fitted in practically the same way except that there are several mirrors set in the walls. The staircase is also a thing of beauty. At the back of the orchestra floor is a promenade all done in marble, the floor tiled and the lights being cleverly shaded.

The inside of the theater is strikingly beautiful. The height from the floor to the ceiling is about seventy-five feet. The first thing which is perceptible upon entering the auditorium is the stage. Inasmuch as the Paramount did not have the regular theatrical set stage the usual method of using flys and drops could not be inaugurated, consequently costly red velvet hangings are draped over the back and sides. Two big velvet curtains separating in the center cover the screen. Extending across the stage in front of the foot-lights is a box full of geraniums. Set back on the stage is white fencing with a boxed bottom up from which come strands of flowers which are entwined on the fence. On each side is a marble bench. In the flowers and across the stage are miniature electric lights. Most of the lighting in the theater is hidden. Amber colored globes are used. Two immense cut glass chandeliers hang in the center of the auditorium. It is understood that each one represents $1,000. The balcony is arranged in box form only, there being twelve boxes. The operating room is on the balcony floor in the back. Two Simplex machines are used. The seating capacity of the entire structure is 1,200. The present management is making a strong appeal to the elite of Newark and has succeeded. It is not unusual to see a number of automobiles in front of the theater at evening exhibitions.

View of Spacious Interior of Paramount Theater, Newark, N. J.

Through the knowledge of Tali Esen Morgan, general manager, the music at the Paramount is probably as good as in any other house in this part of the country. The most attractive feature is perhaps the Paramount banjola orchestra, for it has always been Mr. Morgan's aim to have something different from the rest in this respect. The banjola orchestra when it was introduced was a revelation to the patrons of the Paramount theater. It is composed of eight men and the instruments used are three banjolas, a mandocello, a violin, a flute, a piano and drums. This combination of music is so pleasing to the ear that invariably at the finish of each overture and interlude the audience break out into applause. The banjola is built on the principle of a banjo but is much louder in volume of sound and is the invention of Jean Ingraham, leader of the orchestra. A three Manual Hutchin's organ is also installed in the theater. The Hutchin concern, while it does not manufacture organs for theater use, favored the Paramount theater with an instrument. Mr. Morgan has secured as organist Clarence Reynolds, a skillful man. He was organist at the Ocean Grove Auditorium, Ocean Grove, N. J. As assistant organists the services of J. Stanley Farrar and Raymond Willever have been obtained. The banjola orchestra does not play during the projection of a feature, but the organ is brought into use in such instances. Mr. Morgan sees to it that the orchestra and organists make a study of all pictures before they are projected for the public so that the proper music may be selected.

The afternoon shows run from 2 to 5 o'clock; the evening entertainments from 7 to 11 o'clock. In the afternoons a feature is shown twice, at the commencement and at the close of each show, with single reels introduced between the showings of the feature. At evening shows it is just the reverse—the single reels are shown first and the feature at the closing. The admission prices are 50 cents for the orchestra reserved seats. The remainder of the orchestra, center, are 25 cents and the side seats sell for 15 cents. The entire balcony loges are 25 cents. There is no reduction at matinees.

Tali Esen Morgan has always been a believer in advertising, which has been one of the reasons of his success. The Paramount theater has a mailing list of about twenty thousand. To these people are mailed each week a program and a multigraphed letter with a reproduction signature, giving the letter a sort of personal touch. The program is attractive and announces in short concise sentences the coming attractions and news of the house. These elements of success have created a demand for the program, and the office of the Paramount is constantly receiving requests from patrons to be put on its mail list.

The big electric sign bearing the name of the theater is set with red lamps. On the outside of the building there are ten 500-watt globes. The name can be seen at a considerable distance.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, SELMA, ALA.

The Academy of Music, Selma, Ala., was built in 1888. It was renovated in 1915. Motion pictures were shown in it in 1911. It is under the management of R. B. Wilby, and has an orchestra of four pieces. There are 949 seats in the entire structure, divided as follows: Orchestra 415, balcony 250, gallery 250, and loges 34. It is equipped with radium gold fibre screen and two Simplex projection machines. The stage has been decorated to represent a pretty garden scene, and it is quite effective. The scale of prices is 5, 10 and 15 cents.

New Empire Theater, Winchester, Va.

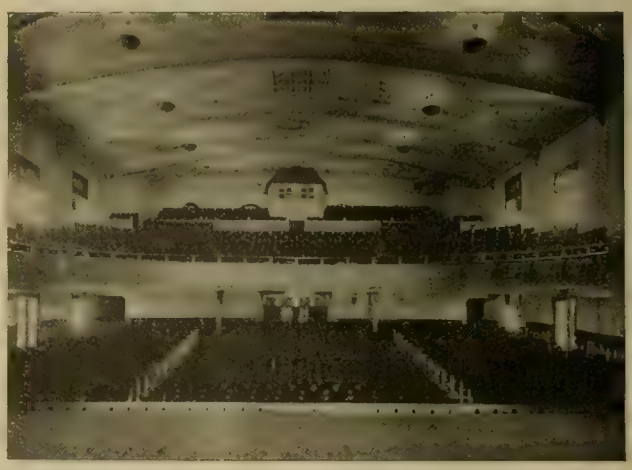
W. H. Baker, Noted Chocolate Manufacturer, Built Big Picture House—Operating Room Is Unconventional in Design.

THE New Empire Theater, Winchester, Va., was built through the public spirit of W. H. Baker, the noted chocolate manufacturer, at a cost of $50,000, and is evidence of his broad interest in the welfare of his home town. The house was designed by J. Henkel Henry, vice-president and secretary of the Empire Amusement Corporation of Winchester, lessees of the structure. The work of construction was also personally supervised by Mr. Henry.

Before entering the picture business, Mr. Henry owned and successfully managed a skating rink on the site of the Empire. When the skating rage decreased, the rink was converted into a picture and vaudeville house, which Mr. Henry conducted up to about two years ago, when the structure was destroyed by fire. The Empire was then erected upon the site, and it is one of the finest theaters of its kind for a town the size of Winchester.

The stage is fully equipped and can handle the largest traveling show, it being 35 feet deep, 60 feet across and 60 feet to gridiron. In the dressing rooms there is hot and cold water, and gas as well as electricity. Each room is well ventilated. The Empire is among the first theaters to use the automatic sprinkler system. The drop curtain is asbestos.

The booth is unconventional in shape; it resembles in appearance a small cottage. The port holes of the booth have been banked and painted so that they bear a similitude to real cottage windows. The roof is gabled, and the flue running to the roof of the theater proper carrying off the heat looks like a chimney and accentuates the illusion of the booth being a cottage. The operating room is practically fireproof. The exterior is pebble dashed. It is fitted with all conveniences.



Interior View of New Empire Theater, Winchester, Va.

The indirect lighting system is used. The floors are carpeted, and the walls and ceilings are adorned with rich frescoing. The most attractive painting is directly over the proscenium arch and represents the people of Winchester appealing to George Washington for protection against the Indians.

The Empire was dedicated on Christmas Day, 1913, and has been making considerable profit since that date under its efficient management. The admission prices are usually 10 and 20 cents. The better class of road shows and vaudeville are run intermittently, but pictures are the principal form of amusement.

PARK TO OPEN MAY 30.

The Park theater, in Rensselaer Park, North Troy, New York, will be opened on May 30 next for its regular summer run. The policy this summer will be features, Kalem's Ham comedies, Essanay's pictures featuring Charles Chaplin, and vaudeville. E. Sacks, of New York City, is to manage the house, and W. Felter will be in charge of the stage, the dimensions of which are 40 by 60 feet. The theater has seating accommodations for 1,100 persons, and standing room for 200 more. The Park is of the open air type and is one of the finest of its kind in the vicinity of Rensselaer Park. A full orchestra will be employed, and the pictures will be projected by two Power's machines.

Matt. Moore, Universal Star

MATT MOORE, Imp-Universal player, was born in the south of Ireland January 8, 1890. He is just twenty-five years old. His parents came to America when he was quite a child and emigrated to Toledo, Ohio, where Matt, with his brothers, Owen and Tom, were educated.

About seven years ago he ran away from home and joined a repertoire company. Later he played with the Al E. Woods, and also with the Chas. E. Blaney companies. Four years he played juvenile leads in stock companies of Toledo, Chicago, Oakland, Milwaukee, Kansas City and then was engaged to tour with "The Virginian," "The Man on the Box," "Paid in Full" and several other big successes.

Matt Moore.

"Matty," as he is affectionately called by his fellow-players, joined the Universal force about three years ago and played in the Imp and Victor companies. He is now Mary Fuller's leading man under the direction of Lucius Henderson.

He is a six-footer, with auburn hair and blue eyes, and is the most quiet, unobtrusive actor in the films despite his great success. Recently he has appeared in the Imp production as Dr. Carson in "The Photoplay Without a Name," Teddy Van Deusen in "Mary's Duke," and the leading male character in "The Sphinx." Matt is the only one of the three movie stars (that is, the Moore brothers) who is still heart-whole and fancy free. And he is very fond of dancing, only he's too bashful to ask a girl to dance! So there!

Marie Cahill on Universal Program

THE first of the Broadway stars to be released on the regular Universal program, in accordance with the announcement which was made last week, and which has already had a profound effect in all sections of the moving picture industry, is Marie Cahill, the musical comedy star, in one of her most brilliant successes, "Judy Forgot," which will be filmed in four reels. The play offers innumerable comedy situations which should make it one of the most delightful of all releases. Miss Cahill is the leading comic opera star on the stage to-day and her acquisition by the movies is one of the events of the present season.

Marie Cahill.

It is also announced at the same time that the film version of "Judy Forgot" will be prepared by the author of that successful piece, Avery Hopwood. This is the first work that Mr. Hopwood has done for the screen, but the Universal lost no time in signing him up as soon as Miss Cahill had been secured.

Miss Cahill's first work in moving pictures will begin almost at once, just as soon as the scenario can be made ready and the company to support her selected. The work will be done at the Universal's studio at Coytesville, N. J., instead of at Universal City in California.

"Judy Forgot" will be remembered by many as the hit of the 1912 musical comedy season, and had a very long and successful run at the Broadway Theatre. The theme was a novel one at the time, and this is believed to be the first time that the comic side of aphasia has been utilized in moving pictures.

It is therefore certain that the production "Judy Forgot" will be an exceptional comedy and one totally devoid of slapstick or anything pertaining to it. Furthermore, it will be put on by one of the very best directors in the realm of motion pictures, Lucius Henderson, who has been directing Mary Fuller, and who has had better success with her than any previous director.

Leonore Ulrich Under Morosco-Bosworth Banner

LEONORE ULRICH, the young star of the Oliver Morosco production, "The Bird of Paradise," has been secured by the Oliver Morosco Photoplay Company, in association with Bosworth, Inc., to appear before the motion picture camera in a big feature production on which work will be started shortly.

Leonore Ulrich.

Miss Ulrich is one of the youngest stars on the theatrical stage, and although but nineteen years of age, has had a remarkably successful career in her short life in theatricals. As in the case of Peggy O'Neill, Miss Ulrich is one of Oliver Morosco's "finds." Some five years ago the little star was working in a dry goods store. Her stage aspirations prompted her to give up her position and journey to Chicago, where she became a chorus girl at the La Salle theater. From there she joined a small stock company in Syracuse, and it was her work with this organization that attracted the producer's attention.

In two years Miss Ulrich played in eighty-six roles and appeared in the principal parts of such productions as "Twelfth Night," "The Virginian," "The Deep Purple," "Cameo Kirby," "The Chorus Lady," "The Time, the Place and the Girl," "Little Tommy Jones," "Get Rich Quick Wallingford," "Dawn of Tomorrow," "The Fortune Hunter" with particular success.

The wonderful success with which Miss Ulrich has been appearing in "The Bird of Paradise" for the past two seasons is widely known and is indicated by the fact that this play is doing the biggest business of any road attraction during the past ten years.

Thanhouser Again Raids "Legit"

Secures the Services of Messrs. Cooke and Warde, Widely Known Theatrical Men.

THINGS are happening rapidly at New Rochelle, for the long arm of Edwin Thanhouser has again reached down into Broadway for the kind of support he is determined to get. Only a few weeks ago it was announced in these columns that he acquired George Foster Platt, the famous stage director among others, but this week saw Mr. Thanhouser working fast. He now has signed Thos. Coffin Cooke and Ernest C. Warde, both known wherever the English spoken drama is patronized.

Thos. C. Cooke.

Mr. Cooke has a record of seventeen years as director for Messrs. Wagenhals and Kempner, during which time he produced with such famous stars as Modjeska, Annie Russell, Blanche Walsh, Louis James, Katherine Kidder and Frederick Warde. Among the more modern successes which he staged are "Paid in Full," "Seven Days" and "The Greyhound." He "served time," as they say, in stock; his record strings itself from coast to coast, and the list of plays covers everything from farce comedy to Shakespeare. Mr. Cooke's seventeen years with one concern is perhaps his highest recommendation, and until he came to Thanhouser's he never was inside a motion picture studio.

A strange coincidence is that among the great tragedians whom Mr. Cooke has directed is Frederick Warde, the eminent Shakespearean authority and lecturer, and that the Ernest C. Warde, who is now his co-worker at the New Rochelle studio is Frederick Warde's son. That's just one round of the hands of time. Ernest Warde, in taking up the work of a motion picture director, brings with him experience well worthy the son of so famous a father; he trouped it with his illustrious pere (Warde and James) and in a few years had reached what was then the actor's Elysium—an engagement with Richard Mansfield. Mr. Warde remained in the company to the end of Mansfield's days, completing nine years of service. For the last five years of this time, however, he was Mr. Mansfield's stage director. In one year he had eleven plays to take care of, and his performance of his duties won him an unusual compliment from the great actor. Since Mr. Mansfield's death, Mr. Warde worked successfully in stock and produced among others Henry Savage's "Everywoman." Andrew Mack was also under his direction.

Ernest C. Warde.

ARRANGING FOR THE FARRAR PRODUCTIONS.

Samuel Goldfish has left New York for Los Angeles to consult with Mr. Lasky and Cecil B. DeMille regarding the forthcoming productions to be made with Geraldine Farrar in leading roles. It is not yet decided what subjects will be provided for Miss Farrar, but Mr. De Mille will direct the productions and the Paramount Company will release them.

Ralph Stuart in Pictures

RALPH STUART, a long-time favorite, and a star with a country-wide reputation, will at last appear on the screen, having been secured by the Knickerbocker Star Features for their three-reel dramas to be released on alternate Wednesdays on the regular program of the General Film Company, starting early in May.

Ralph Stuart.

Mr. Stuart has completed his first picture, "The Kick-Out," under the direction of Robert T. Thornby, a former Vitagraph director. He is featured as the Mayor, a part which calls for an unusually strong character combining great force and varied emotions, from the gentle and tenderly regard of a father for a motherless daughter to a face to face battle with a crafty city boss and the masterly handling of an infuriated mob.

Mr. Stuart's stage successes include his own play, "By Right of Sword," also leads in "Strongheart," "The Rainbow's End" and many other dramas of equal character and strength. He was also lead in the original cast of "Wallingford," as produced in Chicago. He has played in stock in nearly all the important cities in the country and at one time directed his own company.

Knickerbocker Star Features are making elaborate plans for their productions. A huge stage, augmenting their present productive capacity many times, has been completed, and no money or efforts are being spared to make these features equal to the best and among the most thrilling dramas available on the General Film program.

LUBIN ANNUAL BENEFICIAL ASSOCIATION.

The Lubin Annual Beneficial Association, consisting of Lubin employees, was formed a few weeks ago and now has a membership of over two hundred. The officers of the organization are: Joseph Smiley, president; Isidor Schwartz, treasurer; Donald C. Scott, secretary. There will be various benefits and dances arranged during the course of the year to promote general good fellowship and to help the treasury. At the end of the year the profits will be divided among the members. The association pays a death benefit of fifty dollars and a sick benefit of seven dollars a week.

In the near future the association will present an amateur performance of George M. Cohan's "Fifty Miles From Boston." The cast will consist entirely of members of the association. All employees of the Lubin plant are eligible for membership. The secretary of the association, Mr. Scott, was recently in New York to attend the funeral of John Bunny. He brought a unique tribute to the great comedian's bier—300 beautiful roses picked by the Lubin players from the wonderful rose gardens of Betzwood.

ALL CELTIC TO RELEASE THROUGH WORLD FILM.

Announcement comes to us that the All Celtic Film Company, Inc., of 1400 Broadway, N. Y., producers of the comedy series of films known as "The Adventures of Rafferty," have closed with L. J. Selznick for their release on the World Film program. The first release, entitled "Rafferty Stops the War," will be ready for distribution by the World May 31.

WARDEN OSBORNE ORDERS PATHE COLOR FILMS.

Warden Thomas Mott Osborne of Sing Sing Prison apparently likes Pathé color films. Manager Burnstein of the Pathé New York Exchange received a telegram from him on the 26th requesting a five-reel program all in color for a show at the prison.

OLYMPIC THEATER, WASHINGTON, D. C.

A Well Conducted and Up-to-Date Neighborhood Picture House Earning Good Weekly Profits.

THE Olympic theater, on U street, near Fourteenth street, Northwest, Washington, D. C., is another of the many houses of Washington, D. C., which commends itself to the neighborhood in which it is located because of its attractiveness, the quality of its exhibitions, and the ceaseless efforts of the personnel to make it the most popular amusement place in the section.

The Olympic theater is built strictly upon sanitary lines. It has been so constructed that with the possible exception of the screen, the entire auditorium can be washed out with a hose without fear of defacement of walls, ceiling or decorations. The floor is of cement. The walls are painted with a green waterproof composition and are ornamented. A paneled baseboard, three feet high, is painted in a slightly darker and contrasting shade. There are ten wall lights in very attractive vari-colored globes. The ceiling is of white art metal and from it is suspended four chain hung electric fixtures of the so-called direct-indirect type, each containing four electric lamps.

The seating capacity of the house is about four hundred. The chairs are roomy and comfortable, and the aisles are wide. The house is well ventilated for there are seven large windows and a 48-inch fan brings in fresh air from the outside, while a 42-inch fan expels the foul air. On the second floor of the building is a heating room fifteen feet wide by twenty-five feet long in which is contained a large number of coils. These are heated to a very high temperature and the warmth is carried into the theater by the fresh air fan. In the summer these coils can be filled with cold water and also used in conjunction with the ventilation plant.

The screen is twelve feet high and sixteen feet wide and the pictures are projected upon it by two Simplex motor-driven machines contained in a well equipped sanitary and fireproof operator's booth.

The exterior of the building is as equally attractive as the interior. It is finished in rough ornamental brick and sandstone. Above the arched way the name "Olympic" is carved in stone. At each side of the entrance is a small poster board above which is an electric light fixture. Beyond the board at the right is a paneled space for a larger board. The name of the theater is also outlined in electric lights at the corner of the building and this can be seen for a long distance.

The lobby is illuminated by two large electric fixtures similar to those within the house and the ceiling is of white art metal which reflects the light to advantage. The floor is paved with mosaic blocks in design. The ticket office is of buff tile with a marble base. The windows are of leaded glass and run up to the roof of the office which is outlined with massive oak timbers.

The Olympic theater is operated by the Columbia Amusement Company, Inc., of which James H. Ellsworth is the president, Robert H. Campbell, Jr., vice-president, and H. Kirkus Dugdale, secretary and treasurer. Mr. Campbell is also the manager of the theater. He reports that regardless of the prevailing dull times a very satisfactory business is being enjoyed. He attributes this to many things—good pictures, good music, good projection and an efficient personnel. The employes are most courteous, not from a sense of duty but a natural desire to please. Located as the house is in a residential section, courtesy is an important factor and is not lost sight of by Manager Campbell. Like practically all of the houses in this section of the city an admission charge of ten cents is made for all shows. A limited number of reels are shown for it is not the policy of this house to keep their patrons amused all night without proper remuneration, to the disadvantage of other exhibitors and without profit to themselves. An honest effort is made at all times to give a good show and both the company and the public are satisfied with the results.

MARTHA HEDMAN IN "THE CUB."

MARTHA HEDMAN, the Swedish actress, is to be starred in the William A. Brady photoplay founded on "The Cub," the very successful stage offering of a few years ago. World Film will shortly release the picture. Opposite to Miss Hedman, there will play John Hines, who has been seen in many favorite offerings, playing minor roles. But Johnnie has worked hard. He has alert humor, eccentricity of gesture, and remarkable powers of facial expression. He is a real comedian, a loyal worker, and he has earned his promotion.

Martha Hedman.

Miss Hedman has a wonderful record of success attendant on hard plugging and perseverance in mastering an alien tongue. In Stockholm she played in repertoire, her work being seen in plays by Strindberg, Donnay, Hauptman. Her career in Sweden was of the most artistic and gratifying nature.

Then she went to London, but couldn't speak English. So she plugged at the language for nine months for nine hours a day. Then she could speak it.

Charles Frohman discovered her. He wanted a type for the role of Renee in Bernstein's "The Attack." Along came Martha Hedman, letter of introduction in hand, and Mr. Frohman chose her on sight for the part, from a score of applicants.

She came to New York; played leads with John Mason in "The Attack" and others; then was lent by Mr. Frohman to Sir George Alexander for the St. James' Theater, London, and then recently came back to New York, and of course has gone into pictures.

Miss Hedman's rigorous training and experience should stand her in good experience in screen work.

The release date of "The Cub" will shortly be announced, and the picture will have the advantage of the direction of Maurice Tourneur, the great World Film producer who recently finished "Trilby."

During the past week a number of important changes have been made in the personnel of the company of Edgar Lewis, the well-known director of the Fox Film Corporation, and while the works of Mr. Lewis have been all that could be desired, it is safe to say that the changes are all for the betterment of productions and that bigger and better things are forthcoming.

Hilltop Theater, Louisville, Ky.

Pretty Suburban Picture House a Model of Elegance—Erected at a Cost of $25,000—Knopf and Hudson Proprietors.

THE new Hilltop moving picture theater in Louisville, Ky., viewed as a medium-sized suburban house designed to last and to supply the amusement needs of its urban neighborhood, really ought to be characterized as a model. As a sample of a first-class structure, thoroughly equipped, it speaks volumes of the permanency of the motion picture business and of the substantial ground upon which it has been established. Here in a neighborhood where the patronage of the house is obliged to be limited for years to come, is a motion picture theater of class and elegance, fitted with the best possible appliances and built at a cost approximating $25,000. It is located in the center of a residence neighborhood with no large establishments in its immediate vicinity except the Kentucky Institute for the Blind, two squares away, but from which this theater cannot hope to draw any patronage. Four squares further up Frankfort avenue from Pope street, near which intersection the Hilltop theater stands, is the Clifton theater, which has been in operation for some time. Some distance down Frankfort avenue is a woolen mill, while still further down the street which crosses it is "Butchertown," from which other theaters draw. Altogether it is a neighborhood filled with homes of the moderately well-to-do. But it has been proved by careful computations that if the 490 seats in this house can be filled each night and at the Sunday matinee at 5 and 10 cents the investment will be a good one. And filled it has been since it was opened in the latter part of January.

H. W. Nadal.

Alfred P. Knopf of Louisville, who is head of a successful chain of grocery stores in Crescent Hill and Clifton, is president of the Hilltop Amusement Company, and Allen W. Hudson, associated with Mr. Knopf in the grocery business, is secretary and treasurer. With them are a few of the successful men of their corner of the city. The Hilltop theater is a brick and concrete structure, with much steel used in its construction. It fronts southwest on Frankfort avenue, occupying the whole of the forty-foot lot and running back 145 feet of the 200 feet of depth of the property. The entrance lobby gives onto a commodious foyer, both with tiled floors, the entrance lobby measuring 36x16 feet, and the foyer 36x15. Three aisles, the center aisle four feet and the aisles at each side 3 feet 8 inches, separate the seating sections and lead to the stage and the exits. The stage, 15 feet deep, with an 18 foot opening, has two dressing rooms attached and is equipped with adequate drops, etc., so as to supply conveniences for small entertainments, vaudeville, etc. Though small, the economy of space has been such that there is plenty of room in all essential places and nó need for congestion anywhere. This condition extends even to the area at the rear where there is a space of 40 by 50 feet which gives onto a capacious, paved alley. Plenty of room is left also between the front row of seats and the railing around the orchestra well, while the passage ways between the stage and the rear exits are separated from the stage by fire walls which are pierced only by asbestos-lined doors.

From the front the class of the theatre is evident. Not that it is strikingly ornate, because it is not, but the white enameled bricks and the plaster pilasters, with the decorations of the entrance lobby, give an effect that is most pleasing. The sidewalk is concrete. Quality of the materials which went into the building is evident from the time the observer steps into the outer lobby. If there is anywhere where cheap construction is glaringly apparent it is in the entrances to theaters of that class. Here substance is manifest. The three-inch brass railing in front of the office window spells permanency, while the woodwork, the balcony, etc., speak of good construction. Mahogany, mirror paneled doors open on each side of the box office into the double-doored passage, lighted by globes in the ceiling and they in turn into the foyer. The first impression of the interior is pleasing. The rough cast plaster walls are tinted in old rose, the ceiling is buff, while the plaster work is finished in rose, blue, buff and gilt. The walls are divided by pilasters which are connected overhead by beams that divide the ceiling into panels. Ornamental plaster designs are placed at regular intervals on the pilaster and plaster friezes, tinted buff, run horizontally from pilaster to pilaster, dropping with the pitch of the floor. Corbels of plaster top the pilasters and apparently support the beams in the ceilings, and an abundantly ornamental, yet restrained, plaster cornice decorates the angles where the ceiling connects with the beams and the side walls. Plaster draperies top the window openings high up in the walls and the proscenium arch is outlined in more ornamental and harmoniously tinted plaster. A large plate glass mirror, surrounded by marble tile, has been set into each side wall of the foyer. A woman's toilet room opens on the foyer, while on the other side of the building, what was to have been a men's toilet, has been made into a passageway and a place for the generator and switchboard, meters, etc. The box office, which is unusually commodious, contains the manager's desk, so that he can be immediately in touch with what is going on. The seats are of good quality. A striking feature about the auditorium is the pitch of the incline. It is seven feet in about 96 feet. It has received the approval, however, of the city building authorities, as is the case with the exit inclines on each side of the stage, which are even steeper. The floor of the whole theater is concrete. That of the auditorium, however, has been covered with a board flooring, with rubber linoleum strips in the aisles and along the exit runaways to give a good foothold.

The booth is located over the box office, and is reached easily by stairs on the outside of the entrance lobby. A four-inch concrete floor and fire walls everywhere mean safety to the people in the house whatever happens. The steel door of the operating room closes automatically and sliding metal plates fall into place, closing all apertures, should any of the connecting wires be broken or fused. A ventilator at the top with a high stack insures that the heat from the machines passes outside. Two Powers 6A machines and a spotlight furnish the operating equipment. A six-chambered steel magazine built out through the wall of the booth and safe from any chance of disaster, has been installed for the storing of reels not in use. Commodious reel rewinding equipment of steel has been provided by cutting a rectangular opening in the table, and inserting a piece of smoked glass held in place by wood blocks attached to the under side of the table by screws through the steel, gives the operator all the light he needs to read the film. The switchboard which controls all the lights in the auditorium is located in the operating room. The ten indirect inverted dome lighting fixtures are wired on several circuits so that one of the 100-watt lamps in any set—three lamps to a fixture—can be lighted or almost any combination, while the bracket lamps on the pilasters at the sides can also be controlled readily. Separate meters connect with the exit lights which are arranged on a two-way switch, as is the case also with the electricity operating the machines, so that in case of a blowout the second circuits could be utilized without waiting for repairs to be made. Five globes light the outer lobby, one with a 500-watt lamp and the others with 300-watt lamps. The front of the building is surmounted by a stained glass globe, which is lighted during the evening and which is wired for lamps up to 1,200 watts. An electric sign made of four-foot letters and burning series of 10-watt lamps occupies the green enameled brick outline on the facade.

The Hilltop theater was set right into the side of a hill, which meant that excavation aplenty had to be made before the level of the lobby floor could be reached—while a greater depth was needed to gain the pitch for the lobby floor. Herbert Nadal puts on a Saturday matinee with special inducements to children. Advertising with this theater for a long time will be a simple proposition. For one reason the billboards in front of the house will come pretty nearly doing the work. The only street car line by which the neighborhood is reached passes the front of the theater, and the corner is one which is well occupied with stores, so that few of the possible patrons will not be kept well informed of what is in prospect with the billboards and the announcements made in the programs used. The Hilltop theater has made a satisfactory beginning on a promising career.

Star Theater, Wichita, Kansas

Attractive Big Star on Facade Symbolic of Theater's Name—Uses Wurlitzer Organ—Seats 640.

THE Star Theater on Douglass avenue, Wichita, Kan., is in the center of the town, and is one of the most prominent buildings of the city in the daytime, and a landmark and guide post for all travelers at night. The picture shows the big electric star on the front of the theater which can be seen for a long distance. The Star Theater seats 640, has a Wurlitzer orchestra, a Powers machine, runs General Film service entirely, with occasional features. It is owned and managed by C. C. McCollister. The building is a little beauty, both outside and inside. It is two stories, having a balcony. Interior decorations are very simple but exceedingly attractive. The exterior is striking. The immense star in the center at the top of the front of the building contains nearly seventy lights, and as seen, three loops of globes extend downward, meeting in a point above the arch of the entrance. This group of lights are designed to flash, and their operation is very effective. The star itself shines out brightly first, the depending loops being dark, then the entire star is extinguished and the light travels downward, seeming to flow from the star along the three loops until it concentrates in the single light at the point of the arch. The globes on each side of the front and in the entrance are continuously illuminated. Mr. McCollister has built up a wonderful business for the Star theater, and not the least element in his success has been the striking attractiveness of his building.

Jack Standing With Lubin

JACK STANDING, the tall, good-looking young Englishman of the Lubin players, who is at present being featured in the "Road o' Strife" serial with Crane Wilbur and Mary Charleson, is one of the most versatile and finished actors in the Lubin studio, and he switches from leads to heavies and from juvenile parts to old-man characters with equal ease. "Spare me from being a one-type actor," is Standing's chief professional request, and since he has been with the Lubin Company this wish has been granted to the nth degree.

Jack Standing.

Jack was born in London and received his first theatrical training in the famous Drury Lane melodrama in London. He began by playing small parts and in a comparatively short time was playing juvenile leads. Following some years spent in melodramas, Standing went into musical comedy and achieved much success in "The Belle of New York," "Floradora," and other productions so popular at that time. Eleven years ago Charles Frohman cabled Standing to come to America and play one of the important roles in "Sherlock Holmes." He did so, and his work was so well liked that Leslie Carter chose him as her leading man. Since then Standing has had a wide and varied experience as an actor. He was leading man for Fannie Ward, Margaret Anglin, Olga Nethersole and other prominent stars, and for a number of seasons was featured in stock companies in Milwaukee, Pittsburgh, Rochester and other cities.

Three years ago Standing joined the Lubin players as a leading man. He left the Lubin Company for a season to play one of the star roles in Belasco's "Drums of Oude" and then returned to the studio and has been with the Lubin Company ever since.

Standing has been featured in some of the most important of the Lubin productions. He is the ideal type for screen work, for aside from his clean-cut, typically English features, and his tall, lithe athletic figure, he is a craftsman in the art of motion picture acting and through these assets he has become the popular photoplayer he is today.

ALL WELCOME ON SELIG SPECIAL.

The impression has been gained in some instances that only newspaper men and families and motion picture exhibitors and families are eligible to take the seventeen days' tour of the Golden West aboard the Selig Exposition Special for the modest sum of $128. This is a mistaken impression, for all friends of the Selig Polyscope Company are cordially invited. There will be room for all. When one train of Pullmans is fully occupied, another will be chartered, and it appears now as if two or more Selig Exposition Specials will roll out of the Chicago station on Thursday, July 8. The sum of $128 covers everything excepting meals. Everything includes transportation, Pullman, all side trips, hotel accommodations, etc., etc. The complete success of this great trip is already assured. The artistic booklets "We Want You With Us in California," issued by the Selig Company, are in great demand.

Madison Theater, Brooklyn, N. Y.

B. F. Keith Opens Another Motion Picture House—Has Seating Accommodations for 600—Under Management of Len Parker.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., is again favored by the opening of a splendid moving picture theater. Notwithstanding the fact that it is smaller in size in comparison with some of the other picture theaters which have recently been opened in that borough, it is none the less appreciated, for in it has been installed all the latest improvements and furnishings and everything that goes to make an up-to-date picture house. It can with propriety be added to the list of excellent theaters that Brooklyn boasts of devoted to the growing moving picture industry. The accompanying illustrations convey a good idea of the exterior and interior views of this new amusement emporium. The name of the structure is the Madison, and it is owned by B. F. Keith. Mr. Keith has fortified himself against competition—at least on the block where the Madison is located. He also owns the Bushwick which is directly behind the Madison, and these two structures occupy the entire block. The theater is not situated in an out of the way place. The location is one from which the management can draw patronage for miles around. The elevated railway and trolley lines pass the door, and not a small percentage of its patrons come by these transportation facilities.

The new addition is situated at the corner of Broadway and Madison street. It is built of brick and terra cotta, and has a strong steel frame. The handsome wall decorations are in perfect harmony with the color of the chairs, carpets, draperies, and the effect is very pleasing. There are twelve large exits in the house. Two Simplex machines with automatic arc controllers are used, and the pictures are projected upon a radium gold fibre screen. The length of the throw is 75 feet. There are 600 seats in the Madison, 450 being on the parquet floor and 150 in the balcony. The operating room is plainly hidden from the view of the patrons. It is situated behind the wall of the balcony at the top. If the reader will look closely at the interior photograph, he will observe between the exit signs the portholes of the booth. The wainscoting is of marble and is mahogany trimmed.

The Madison is operated by the Madison Operating Corporation of which J. J. Maloney is president. Len Parker, who had been for the past six years manager of B. F. Keith's Crescent stock theater, Brooklyn, has been installed as manager of the Madison. That the kind of shows he is putting on is meeting with the exigencies of the patrons is attested by the fact that the house is doing a capacity business since it was opened on Sept. 12 last. The shows are continuous from 1:45 p. m. to 11 p. m., and the admission price is 10 cents the entire house.

Eugene O'Brien with the World Film.

BORN in Dublin, an agreeably few years ago, Eugene O'Brien, who plays the lead in the World Film Corporation forthcoming thriller, "An Indian Diamond," is endowed with a personality that will surely please motion picture fans the moment his handsome face is seen on the screen. Eugene's Milesianism has been tempered and mellowed by some rich and varied experiences in the Western States.

Eugene O'Brien.

For one so young he has accomplished much meritorious stage work. With Ethel Barrymore in Pinero's "Midchannel" and Margaret Illington in "The Thief," he established himself in high favor with critical audiences. He also "led" with the late Kyrle Bellew, and the still happily living Henry Woodruff, Fritzi Scheff, Irene Fenwick, Frances Starr and Ann Murdock. He went from a medical school to the stage—a step which only a humorous Irishman could conceive and successfully accomplish.

Frank Crane, the director of the picture, regards Eugene O'Brien as a precious find; and Crane is a good judge of such matters. Frank always "casts" astutely and well.

This is Mr. O'Brien's first appearance in motion pictures. He has all the potentiality of becoming a (screen) matinee idol, as his good looks are not the least of his many assets. Chiefest of all, however, is the fact that besides being a good actor he is a good fellow.

Reviews of Current Productions

"THE GODDESS."

First Four Episodes of the New Vitagraph Serial Are Well Received by Audience at Special Showing.

Reviewed by Lynde Denig.

WHATEVER may be said about "The Goddess," the authors, Gouverneur Morris and Charles W. Goddard, cannot be accused of imitation. Before the first showing at the Vitagraph theater, A. E. Smith, of the Vitagraph Company, stepped before the screen and a few words expressed expectancy, akin, one might suppose, to that experienced by a playwright on the opening night of his play. He said that he spoke not only for himself; but for Director Ralph Ince, Anita Stewart, Earle Williams and everyone in any way connected with the production, when he declared that the best efforts of the Vitagraph Company had gone into the making of "The Goddess," and that its reception at the hands of an audience was awaited with the deepest concern. There was no doubt about the originality of Mr. Morris's idea; but its usefulness in pictures had still to be tested. Nothing so pretentious had been attempted in previous serial photoplays; the old standbys of fast melodrama and so many "punches" in a reel had been surplanted by a story with a definite theme behind it, rather a daring innovation, perhaps, in view of the themeless films to which audiences have become accustomed.

If one measures entertainment by thrills, "The Goddess" is not a competitor of several of its well-known predecessors; but if entertainment is recognized in an appeal to intelligence, the production is quite in a class by itself among serials. Mr. Morris invested his theme with romance and mingled realism and symbolism in its expression. The opening is auspicious and straight to the point in suggesting the significance of what is to follow. Three great financiers, the triumvirate, he calls them, are seriously perturbed by a threatened decline of their power. While they are in consultation the scenes dissolve into flashes of the giant industries they dominate; but the railroads, the steamship lines, the factories are slipping from their grasp and into the maw of that vast, nondescript rival of monopoly, the public. They must win the public by some semispiritual means.

A hypnotist comes to their aid. He assists in kidnapping a little girl who is taken into the wildest recesses of the wilderness and reared to womanhood in sublime innocence, unrelieved by the most rudimentary knowledge of sex, for no man ever enters the cave in which she lives. She comes forth a radiant goddess and, as carefully planned, is immediately placed under the spell of the hypnotist, who has come to guide her into the world that she may reform it according to the dictates of the capitalistic triumvirate. But the socialistically inclined son of one of the capitalists chances to be enjoying a vacation in the woods and he meets Celestia when she is not under the spell. He aids her in eluding her captor, for whom she has an instinctive aversion; they are followed, caught and the Goddess is brought to New York under the hypnotist's influence, destined, apparently, to do the bidding of her masters. In truly goddess-like fashion she is leading a crowd through the Pennsylvania station at the close of the first reel of the fourth episode.

What is in store for Celestia and her socialist sweetheart, certain to reappear soon, is an open question. One gathers, however, that Mr. Morris has devised a complete propaganda for softening the hearts of stern men and giving Christian doctrines a practical application.

The opening episodes vary between realistic details and fanciful unrealities. The premise of a struggle between monopoly and the public control of utilities is founded on fact; whereas the remedy sought by the triumvirate is pure fancy, calculated to clothe a serious subject in a pleasing popular guise. Technically, the production has been well handled by Director Ince, save that at times the action seems unduly slow. Had Miss Stewart employed a hair-dresser and a costumer in her wilderness cave, she could not have presented a more radiant goddess. In appearance and manner she will charm and that, of course, is half the battle when a woman sets out to reform the world. Earle Williams, as the young idealist, and Paul Scardon, as the hypnotist, figure prominently and to advantage in the opening episodes.

"RUMPELSTILTSKIN."

Four-Reel Masterpicture Fairy Story Produced by Thomas H. Ince.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

PRINCIPALLY remarkable for charm of treatment, "Rumpelstiltskin" will certainly please the kiddies. It is a real fairy story of the olden kind, with a Prince who goes out alone in quest of adventure and comes upon the beautiful daughter of a miller in humble circumstances only to learn that delight of delights, being loved for one's self, the most villainous-looking dwarf ever shown on the screen, King Cole of the nursery rhymes, his jester, the Prince of Comic Makeups, Solemn counsellors who satirize the elaboration of system in Germany—"It can't be done except on order"—the Good Fairy, Simple Simon and other creatures of childhood fancy.

While not addressed to mature minds, "Rumpelstiltskin" may have a lingering fascination for those grown folks who invariably accompany children to the circus, particularly as the treatment is artistic in the matter of settings, grouping and costume—the general effect is very pleasing to the eye. Grown folks will see materializations of some of their childish ideals, and there is the faintest shadow of a theme in the craving of Old King Cole for the secret of spinning straw into gold. It may be doubted that a theme is of any particular value in such a story, but the story can be raised in value, as in classification, to some such "static" drama as that devised and successfully portrayed by one of the greatest of modern playwrights. Fairy tales of the future, rather than those of the past, might suggest what shall be finer and more beautiful in life as it is to be, a delightful visitation during the present monotony of production.

"The Commuters."

James Forbes' Merry Farce Comedy Produced in Pictures, in Five Parts, by George Kleine, with a Company That Commands Favor Even in the Minor Roles.

Reviewed by James S. McQuade.

THE first thought that comes to me in beginning this review is that the subjects in the Kingdom of Fildom, myself among them, owe to George Kleine a printed expression of appreciation of the delightful screen treats he has furnished us for some time past, in farce and comedy subjects. Not only has he delighted us by clean, well-directed and cleverly acted photo-comedies; he has demonstrated that moving pictures are capable of conveying many of the subtleties of comedy as well as the action, and that, while they can never supplant the point and piquancy of the spoken word, they can come sufficiently close to it to produce the same mental impressions.

In this connection, exception must be taken to some unnecessary subtitles in "The Commuters." Reference is made to the phone discussion between Hetty Brice and her husband Larry, after she and the maid have discovered "Sammy" in the guest room.

"How dare you leave a strange man in the house?" And "But, sweetheart—" could well be left out. "He says he can't leave in evening clothes," and "I'll send a suit home" are quite sufficient to convey the meaning. "I am mad at you," uttered by the man who brought the suit of clothes to the Brice home for "Sammy," after "Sammy" had manhandled him, should find no place as a subtitle. The man could look mad without saying a word, and the implied humor of his attitude can be conveyed just as well by the pictures alone.

These points, however, will be easily overlooked, because of the general excellence of the direction. The scenes—an unusually large number of them at that—have all been selected or constructed with appropriate foresight and care. The interiors, which abound in this production, have entailed a great deal of preparation and supervision. The cabaret scene is very realistic and the action contributes to the realism. The interiors showing various rooms in the Brice home, from kitchen to guestroom, are just what one might expect. The train scene, in which "Old Shipman" and forty-six commuters are left in the lurch, is brimful of fitting action, while the departure of the steamer out of New York harbor, which has been missed by Larry and Rolliston and, as it later turns out, by their boss himself, has convincing local color. The joy auto ride of Sammy, Larry and Rolliston also bears testimony to the same nice painstaking in production.

The scene showing the meeting of the Woman's Suffrage Club in the Brice home is admirably worked out. The speaker at the meeting is thoroughly typical of her class, and her mannish manners and airs compel both smiles and laughter. The way three of the suffragettes treat poor "Sammy," who is taken for a burglar in the Brice house, is a ludicrous illustration of the muscular strenuosity of the weaker sex.

The selection of the cast, down to the impersonator of the humblest character, has been most happy. Indeed, one can scarcely speak too highly in commendation of this feature of the production. Take, for example, the cook in the Brice home, the policeman, the night telephone girl at the cabaret, Old Shipman, the fat office boy under Brice, and even the boys who pelt "Sammy" with stones, everyone acts his or her part with such natural ease that everything appears real. Much of this, of course, is due to capable direction.

My old friend, Dan Crimmins, wins many a laugh as the officious policeman, and Agnes Mare makes a strong character part out of Carrie, the maid in the Brice household. "Old Shipman" has a great make-up, and the man who impersonates him carries the part with as much interest as is displayed by any of the principals.

Chas. Judels, in the role of "Sammy," the leader of the cabaret orchestra, easily takes the center of the stage among the principals. The more often one views the pictures, the better one appreciates his comedy work. It is intensely funny to watch him in the scene where Larry and his wife are at "outs." How seemingly unconscious is he of the penalty awaiting the man who interferes in family squabbles! His ignominious fate should be a warning to all.

Irene Fenwick sustains the fine character of Hetty Brice with talented conception and art, and Della Connor is a deliciously sweet exponent of Mrs. Rolliston. George LeGuere is excellently placed as Larry Brice. He is forced to high tension throughout the action of the story and always carries the part well. Rolliston, the companion in revels of "Sammy" and Larry, could not have been assigned to more capable art than that of Dan Moyles. The somewhat different treatment to which Rolliston subjects his wife as compared with that given Mrs. Brice by her beloved hubby affords a fine comedy contrast.

The photography is of uniform fine quality throughout the five reels.

"The Absentee."

Five-Reel Mutual Masterpicture of Vital Theme and Symbolic Treatment.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

UNDER the skilled guidance of Frank E. Woods and Christy Cabanne, "The Absentee" presents a new and difficult form of treatment. It is actually an allegorical and symbolical drama, though the opening scenes are more strictly so. It has the philosophic questioning and high reasoning of a story purely symbolical in its general effect, though events following the opening allegory deal with modern life in a very realistic way at times. The entire scheme is first presented in poetical fashion, the characters representing traits, influences and results that dominate in the modern story. Power, Might, Ambition, Contentment, Happiness, Innocence, Vanity and Justice, are set forth in concrete images, as in the stage plays of Ibsen, Rostand and Maeterlinck.

Realists may object, but symbolism simply adds to the variety of program—it is nothing to be condemned because it is different from accepted forms. There is danger in it, and chief peril is that of forecasting allegorically what is to follow in the main body. When carefully handled, however, there is a new suspense set up, a sort of intellectual pleasure in watching how the theme works out. One error, to my way of thinking, was to present "Evil" as a personage visible to the other characters, but it might have involved a vast amount of double exposure to have presented "Evil" simply as an invisible influence, constantly at the elbow of those inclined to listen when evil counsel is offered.

Under present conditions of production, when there is ever present an impatience to get results, when authors, directors and actors are hampered by imposed time limits, when one difficult piece of work is barely finished before another stares the company out of countenance, a generous view of theoretical imperfections must be taken. The advent of symbolism is welcome. It is in the essence of dramatic representation, in the essence of life itself, and it lends itself in many cases to an exhibition of the poetic aspects of human character and to the nobler issues of existence.

The theme doubly worked out is that of the absentee who has built up a successful industry and retired to enjoy the results of his work, giving small consideration to those who labored with him and for him, who contributed from their just portions to his material advantage. That is a live theme,

The Popular Plays and Players Production of

The HEART of A PAINTED WOMAN

THIS IS WHAT HE WROTE AND SYNDICATED THROUGH THE THOUSANDS OF PAPERS HE WRITES FOR

COPYRIGHT BY ALAN DALE

I saw a picture release the other day that almost reconciled my jealous dramatic soul to the vogue that the "movies" have established for themselves. It was called "The Heart of a Painted Woman" and it was exceedingly fascinating and spectacular. The average "movies" leaves me absolutely cold, because it is usually undramatic, and I find it hard to concentrate myself upon its incessant changes. This told its story exquisitely and it was, moreover, admirably taken. It was the versatile actress Olga Petrova who played the "Lead"—the second picture, I am told, that she has ever made. Well, to my mind, she has the well-established "movie" artists beaten at their own game. You could at least detect good acting and wonderful poise, and I'll venture to say that the pictorial ladies of the usual "movie" concerns fail to emphasize these. I've looked in vain among the favorites of the "screen" for any symptom of dramatic ability or "magnetism" and I've tried hard to discover these.

A dramatic critic could review "The Heart of a Painted Woman" and could do himself justice—or in-justice, as the case might be; one could say and think things about it. I never slept once, and that is a record for me, as far as pictures are concerned. Usually a splendid drowsiness steals over me and my numbed faculties yield me no sensation. I won't say that I have made an exhaustive study of pictures, because that would be untrue. Others there may be just as good as "The Heart of a Painted Woman" but I have not seen them and, well, I'm from Missouri. In any case, you will admit that I am candid, and admit a certain ignorance. If I ever see anything better than the aforesaid picture, I'll come right out and say so.

This is one of the regular releases on the Metro Program and merely foreshadows what is to follow.

Twelve other Petrova productions will feature the next METRO year

Recapitulation

Twenty-five stars that are stars in every sense of the word. Forty of the biggest and most successful plays which will be adapted to the screen. Two new producing allies and five releases already made that established the program as a certainty and constant means of quality pictures successfully distributed through branches actually interested and directly participating in the profits of the parent body and actually partners in producing, represents the five active weeks of Metro.

True Metro is a new program. Electric lights were new and were scoffed at by the candle makers.

Queen Elizabeth required two years to develop a belief in Columbus.

The older programs ever and anon knock a new one. This is human nature. But no one ever knocks a dead one.

Every tombstone bears an approving epitaph. When they begin quoting the opposition to gain their own ends, the opposition is successful.

The oldest is not always the best. Pioneers have ever been improved upon.

The man who was pioneer in building beds would get a revelation if he tried one of the new box springs.

Metro is the newest program. Hence the subject for much comment.

No greater strides, no more far reaching results have been obtained in a year than Metro has accomplished in five weeks of grim, determined, forceful effort.

No overhead other than actual necessities.

Every dollar spent is spent in the production that goes forward to the exhibitor through an exchange that is as much interested in his success as in his own.

Men of tradition in the industry are at the Metro helm and there will be no expensive experimenting, no costly blunders as suffered by other distributing concerns and were necessarily taken from the negative cost.

The screen showing the Metro productions will never be cheated to meet overwhelming overhead.

The mutual co-operative plan has been grasped by the exhibitors and the result assures more than success for Metro. It assures a doubling of the capacity, an increase of productional proclivities and a greater array of the productions that have impressed everybody by reason of the diversity of subjects, quality of productions and sincerity of the parent body, the eighteen distributing branches, and the five important producing companies.

as results will undoubtedly demonstrate. Robert Edeson as the absentee turning from success to pleasure is satisfying to the eye and refined in performance. The whole cast is good, some of the minor roles thrusting themselves into prominence through strong personality. Olga Grey leads the lovely women in performance, her opportunities fitting her as if she had been made for them or they for her, and to lead in a gathering of so many lovable creatures is in itself an honor. Mr. Woods and Mr. Cabanne are working in a way that is bound to produce large results, they are working in harmony.

Pathe Actor Gets Part He Likes.

Donald MacKenzie, the Pathe producer, tells some interesting things of George Probert, his leading man in his new picture, "The Fortunes of Pierre." It seems that to Mr. Probert in the past have fallen some of the most unsatisfactory roles an actor could have. Villains are bad enough, but there are varying degrees of stage villainy even as there are in real life. To play a low-down, detestable character and play it to the life may be an artistic triumph, but it certainly leaves a bad taste in the mouth of the unfortunate who is cast for the part. Mr. Probert had two such parts in succession, that of the Cadet in "The Lure" and Oskar Von Guggen in "Innocent." He played the parts with all the subtlety and finish of which they were capable and scored—but he did it so well that people avoided him like a plague. Former friends passed him by, ladies of his acquaintance crossed to the other side of the street when they saw him coming, and he became very unhappy.

It was some time before people realized that he was really the religious, home-loving, clean-minded man that he really is.

Three Biograph Productions.

"The Maid o' the Mountains" in Two Parts and Two Single-Reel Subjects Ready for Release.

Reviewed by Lynde Denig.

IN "The Maid o' the Mountains," the Biograph Company will release on June 1, a two-part drama dealing with the mountain whites—moonshiners, the pretty daughter of a none too respectable father, her unwelcome suitor, the marshal in quest of the law-breakers and the handsome novelist of fiction, who goes to the wilds for a vacation. Naturally, the very first person the novelist meets when he sets his tent in the wilderness, is the moonshiner's daughter. That they will fall in love with each other is a foregone conclusion; but there are serious complications, for the rejected suitor holds a threat over her head. He knows that her father shot a man, and unless she becomes his wife he promises to make the marshal his confidant, which will mean death for the moonshiner.

Such, in substance, is the material enlarged into an acceptable film melodrama, profiting by purposeful action and a fair degree of suspense consistently held throughout the two reels. The characterizations in the hands of Louise Vale, Kenneth Davenport, Edward Cecil, Jack Drumeir and Franklin Ritchie are about what one might expect in a picture of the kind; they are true to photoplay conventions. In matters of production, "The Maid o' the Mountains," is up to the high standard being maintained in two-reel Biographs—a standard that never permits slipshod workmanship.

"Bobby's Bargain."

A juvenile comedy, with the certain appeal of a picture introducing a company of youngsters, is "Bobby's Bargain," to be released May 21. It is a brightly conceived story, showing how Bobby trades his toys for a cute baby that strikes his fancy at the moment. The little girl, in whose care the infant was left, thought she had made a fair bargain until she returned home and heard what mother had to say. Off they go to recover the youngest member of the family, who is sleeping contentedly on Bobby's bed with her youthful master standing guard, while his foolish old grandfather snoozes in a chair nearby. The grandfather is an odd character, that no doubt will delight a child's sense of humor. With his grotesque strut and his semblance of deafness, combined with approaching senility, he recalls the broad comedy caricature once dear to the interpreters of stage farce. The children in the picture make a pleasing group, and the little fellow playing Bobby appears to be unusually bright without being pert or self-conscious.

"The Buckskin Shirt."

Roy Norton is the author of this single-reel that, like "Bobby's Bargain," is quite as well adapted to the children as to the adults in an audience. Essentially, it is a boy's role, introducing the Wild West as described in story books, with a stage-coach hold-up, no end of hard-riding, straight-shooting cowboys and a true hero for the friend of the eastern lad, who more than anything else wants a buckskin shirt. He expresses his wish in a note and the kind-hearted westerner responds by fashioning a shirt with his own hands for his youthful correspondent. But between the making of the shirt and its delivery there comes a series of accidents, truly western and exciting enough to satisfy the most adventure-loving youngster. The director was particularly fortunate in his choice of a natural and handsome boy for the character of the lad who sets his heart on a buckskin shirt. May 31 is the date named for the release of this subject.

"The Butterfly."

World Film Corporation Releases Five-Part Picturization of H. K. Webster's Novel.

Reviewed by Lynde Denig.

PLENTY of action, this five-part drama undoubtedly has; but unfortunately the action is not always the logical outcome of events or of character. There are times when an audience may feel the need of a little more motivation; a more plausible preparation to account for things happening thus and so; a more closely knit narrative to give the semblance of human probability to the lives of "The Butterfly" and her friends. Lacking something of the suspense born of a thoroughly developed story, the picture version of Henry Kitchell Webster's book must depend largely upon the appeal of the scenes, considered individually, and upon the acting of Howard Estabrook, Barbara Tennant and in lesser roles, Jessie Lewis, Julia Stuart, Fred Radcliffe, O. A. C. Lund and Albert Emundson. Mr. Lund directed the production.

The characters are introduced in the land of the pyramids—as conceived by a scenic artist—and there we are given a suggestion of the misfortunes destined for later years. Some of the settings in the opening reel are very well contrived in view of the difficulties to be overcome. Time passes and the scene shifts to America, where Elaine Arthur, a little girl when first met, has become a famous dancer, known as "The Butterfly." The strongest dramatic action in the production comes on the night that the dancer gives a performance in a town near her old home, and for one reason or another, all of the characters in the story have assembled in the neighborhood of the theater. Elaine's stepmother and sister have come to see her dance, likewise an old admirer, and then there is the villain of the play, a deformed man who is a bitter enemy of the stepmother. He sneaks into her room in the hotel, stabs her and escapes that the blame may be placed on several innocent persons, among them "The Butterfly" and her admirer.

The escape of the dancer and her sweetheart via a freight car is no more remarkable than the ease with which the detective traces them to a distant town. A deathbed confession clears the situation. While Mr. Estabrook is the featured player, Miss Tennant really has the leading role, which she handles acceptably. She passes readily from the portrayal of a little girl to that of a young woman and an accomplished dancer.

"The Black Ring"

Amusing Crook Melodrama in Three Reels, Produced by Tom Moore for Kalem Company.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

PERHAPS the most widely popular kind of story today is the exciting crook melodrama. This three-reel offering, "The Black Ring," was made to fill, in an intelligently commercial way, the demand for light stories of marked suspense, mere kill-time offerings to rest tired or bored people.

It pictures for us a band of organized thieves; starts a love interest which is slight but pretty; makes the heroine's new necklace the point of attack that brings the gang's operations into pertinent relationship with the hero's love-making; and ends, after a few astonishing and fresh incidents, with the capture of the evil doers by the hero and the police.

The heroine is the sweetly girlish daughter of a rich retired business man. The family chauffeur wears a black ring, the badge of the gang which is composed of many characters some of whom are servants in the houses of the rich of the neighborhood. The leader of the gang is "in society," and is making love to the girl merely to get her valuable necklace. The rich young man, who is to be the hero, is out for a walk and finds the car stalled, its chauffeur drunk. This rich youth's consenting to become chauffeur is plausible rather than fresh.

Scene from "The Black Ring" (Kalem).

From this point, the new chauffeur is "on the job" and in fine dramatic position to foil the intentions of the gang.

The plot is laid out to make a smooth flow of narrative; yet cannot safely be called powerful, though it holds interest and serves its purpose adequately. After the acting and personalities of the picture, which are delightful, the fresh incident and detail are its most commendable points. It keeps the spectator in a frame of mind of amused interest rather than of excited expectancy, and as a whole is very acceptable.

The best acted role is the retired merchant, by Richard Purdon, whose able, even acting helps many a Kalem picture. Marguerite Courtot is, as usual, a real heroine. Tom Moore, director and hero, does very well. Robert Ellis is an able leader of the crooks.

"The Girl Who Had a Soul"

A Three-Reel Version of a Stirring Crook Story Featuring Mary Fuller.

Reviewed by Margaret I. MacDonald.

AGAIN we must draw attention to the fact that the story of the production has nothing really new about it. But from this point of view more honor to those who have woven the theme, old as it is, into a picture that has the power to hold our attention continuously through three reels of film, leaving us rather peevish because there is not more to follow.

Lucius Henderson has made the picture from the scenario of Elaine Sterne; and Mary Fuller has interpreted in an inimitable manner the character of the girl accomplice of a band of crooks, and who is found, in spite of "Dutchy's" insistence that she has no use for such luxuries, to have a soul and a big one. Playing opposite her is Matt Moore, and assisting in the general constitution of the production are various others of marked ability, to which latter fact is due in a large measure the enjoyable character of the picture.

Scene from "The Girl Who Had a Soul" (Victor).

The careful study which Lucius Henderson has made of his subject is evident in the care which has been given the smallest detail, for there is realism in every moment of the play. Mary Fuller is truly a delight in her handling of the role of "Mary the Dodger." Some of her best work is done in the home of the young doctor, who after bringing her to recovery from an automobile accident, she having been knocked over by a passing machine, makes her his housekeeper in place of one who has recently resigned. Here she falls in love with her employer, and when in self defense he kills his secretary who also deprives him of the love of his fiance, takes the blame of the murder, and is on trial when the doctor recovers from the attack of brain fever from which he has been suffering since the incident and presents himself before the court. He is acquitted and later takes as his wife the "girl who had a soul."

The production has been splendidly photographed, and too much praise cannot be given it as a whole. It is alive with human interest, and has a tremendous pull.

Alliance Program in England.

One of the biggest deals during the past week in New York film circles was the signing of the contracts by President Cobe of the Alliance Films Corporation, and Edgar Hounsell the head of the Anglo-American Film Co., of London, whereby the latter concern will in the future be the sole distributors of the Alliance Program in the British Isles.

Mr. Hounsell, who is one of the oldest feature men, in point of service in the English film world, sailed for Great Britain last Saturday on the Lusitania, accompanied by Edward Barry who will be in the service of the Anglo-American as sales manager. Mr. Barry although of English birth is well known among American picture men, having been connected with several concerns in New York during the past few years.

Honeymooners Surprised.

Monday was a big day for Mr. and Mrs. Morris Foster (she was (is) Mignon Anderson, at the Thanhouser studio. The newly-weds returned from their honeymoon in Florida, were imprisoned temporarily in one of the offices in the executive building and the whole stock company and office staff were summoned in a prearranged signal. Then there was uncovered before them a magnificent set of Colonial silver, the gift of all the Thanhouserites. Mignon tried to talk and express her feelings, but a big gulp was the best she could do—and Foster gulped his endorsement.

"The Chalice of Courage"

The Vitagraph Company Adapts Cyrus Townsend Brady's Story Into an Impressive Blue Ribbon Feature.

Reviewed by Lynde Denig.

RIGHT at the opening of this remarkably well presented picture the hero is placed in an extraordinary position. The horse being ridden by his wife along a mountain trail makes a misstep and rolls down a steep cliff. The woman, mortally injured, but still conscious is found by her husband lying among the rocks and she begs him to end her misery. Under the circumstances, he does the only humane thing. He shoots a bullet through her brain and a few moments later we see him building a grave of stones while a flock of vultures hover ominously overhead. William Newbold, a young engineer filled with the joy of health and high spirits has been forced to kill the person whom he treasures above everything else in the world. It is a good situation on which to base a study of character, with the probable results of morbid brooding and the not unlikely conclusion that after all he was little better than a murderer. Mr. Brady chose to work along other lines, however. Newbold becomes a recluse in the mountains and lives undisturbed while the other threads of the story are being drawn together.

The picture is of the West from first to last; but in the quality of the story and the very fine production provided by Director Rollin S. Sturgeon, it is far removed from the subjects one may expect to find under the head of western. The plot is adequate for six interesting reels and consistent, too, save in a few comparatively inconsequential details. Mountain scenery in all its variety and at all seasons, from spring to the dead of winter, was perfectly photographed and the film was tinted and toned to produce the most natural of atmospheric effects.

Myrtle Gonzalez plays the part of an eastern girl, who goes West with her uncle and is wooed by Armstrong, a man of few principles, who earlier in his career tried to steal Newbold's wife. One day Enid wanders too far from the camp and is saved from death by the mountain recluse, who is forced to take her to his cabin. And there they are snowed in through the long winter months with the usual emotional consequences. The misery they experience because of a love which they feel must be broken, would be more convincing if the audience were shown any really good reason why they should not marry. Newbold's sentimental fidelity to the memory of his wife is not explanation enough, nor is there cause for separation in any ties attributed to the girl. Needless to say, the romance has a pleasant termination and the troublesome Armstrong is permanently removed. The cast is strong, with William Duncan, George Holt, William V. Ranous and Otto Lederer in congenial roles.

Kleine Optical Company Performs Projection Feat.

One of the most remarkable projection feats in the annals of picture making was performed by the Kleine Optical Company at the big White City Amusement Park, Chicago, last week. The Kleine Optical Company succeeded in throwing a picture a trifle over 186 feet amid a blaze of light from the thousands of electric lamps in the park. The great white tower rises to a height of 475 feet has at its base a band shell into which the picture was projected. The thousands of lights on the tower, which can be seen for miles, were entirely overcome. The picture pulls more than eighty amperes of direct current.

Laura Hope Crews on Her Way to the Lasky Studios.

Laura Hope Crews, who has just been engaged by the Lasky Feature Play Company, by arrangement with Morris Gest, to star in the Lasky-Belasco picturization of "The Fighting Hope," has already started on her trip to the studios in California. Miss Crews is accompanied on her journey by Miss Rida Johnson Young, the noted playwright and novelist, who is now at work on a new play to be produced by Mr. Gest.

Arnold Daly in Shaw Plays.

By arrangement with Pathe Freres and the Wharton Brothers, Arnold Daly has been released from his "Exploits of Elaine" engagement in order that he may continue his season in New York with the Bernard Shaw plays, in which he is appearing personally. Mr. Daly has completed twenty-four episodes of the "Exploits."

He will continue with the "You Never Can Tell" and "Arms and the Man" companies until about June 1st, and then go to French Lick Springs for a much needed rest. Mr. Daly will engage in no further picture work before the first of July, at the earliest. Since the success of the "Exploits" he has had many offers, but as yet has accepted none of them.

As Mr. Daly's contract with Pathe Freres and the Wharton Bros. called for his exclusive services, he greatly appreciates the courtesy of these firms in allowing him to appear personally in the Bernard Shaw plays.

"The Woman"

A Splendid Lasky Production Built on the Famous Belasco Success and Filmed in a Masterly Manner.

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

ALL hits and no misses" is the way to sum up the review of this fine feature. "The Woman" has a powerful and fascinating plot taken from modern American life and every inch is vibrant with human interest. The interplay of politics and social life, the weaving of a supreme human motive into the fabric of the story and its sudden and stirring "denouement" make "The Woman" a true masterpiece. Whether the film adaptation was easy or difficult we will never learn for we see nothing but the finished product with not the faintest trace of the toil in the workshop. I have never seen a film play showing greater skill in direction. George E. Moffat deserves to rank high among American directors after this effort.

I know I am saying a good deal for the film when I mention the fact that Theodore Roberts has the leading part. In this case, however, Mr. Roberts does not dominate the film, he is only part of it. This ought to indicate the inherent strength of the play itself. Ernest Joy gave an excellent impersonation of the Hon. Matthew Standish and Mabel Van Buren was uncommonly strong in the part of Grace Robertson. The histrionic honors of the play, it seems to me, go to Lois Meridith whose portrayal of the telephone girl won the audience at The Strand almost at the very first appearance. Her work contributed very largely to the unqualified success of the play. The scene in which she defies a "political third degree" has rarely been equaled in the best of plays for power and pathos. The part of the telephone girl is really the hinge on which the dramatic values of the play turn. The slightest false note might have spoiled the best intentions of the playwright, but there were only true notes. The admiration of the audience for this plucky girl from the ranks of the plain people broke forth in applause in two of her strong scenes. Equally fine with the cast were the settings. The scenes in the House of Representatives, the atmosphere of the lobby, the lights and shadows of life in Washington, the superb photography—all helped to make "The Woman" what it is: a genuine screen masterpiece.

"The New Exploits of Elaine"

"The Saving Circles" Proves One of the Most Thrilling Episodes of the New Exploits.

WATCHING week after week the deftness with which each episode of the now famous Pathe-Hearst serial is being handled it is astounding to note the limitless manner in which thrills and innovations of all sorts make their appearance. In fact we wonder how much longer the pace can be kept up; and we have not finished wondering before another remarkable episode follows in the trail of the last one.

This time Wu Fang and his accomplices have robbed the Government of the ultra-powerful Trodite, the possession of which has been the pride of the department of militia, and he has hired an expert aviator to take him aloft with a few bombs of the Trodite and some poisoned arrows to end at last the career of his enemy Craig Kennedy, and also that of Elaine. Before taking the flight he has taken the precaution to mark the top of Kennedy's house with a large white circle so that there will be no slip-up on the job. This has been discovered however by Jamieson and Kennedy and the circle has been carefully scrubbed away by the willing Jamieson, and a similar circle placed over the house in which Wu Fang has stationed his agents to keep watch.

The end of it all is that Kennedy as usual with Might on his side contrives to place a shot so effectually that the monoplane and its occupants plunge headlong to the ground. Wu Fang is not yet out of the way, however, and the last we see of him he is writhing in agony beside the debris of the machine and the dead body of his companion.

This episode is an unusually good one, and characteristic of the series, has many original points about its development.

Biograph Re-Issues

Successfully Revives Subjects Directed by D. W. Griffith with All-Star Casts.

The announcement made by the Biograph Company to the effect that they will re-issue the all-star Biographs produced by D. W. Griffith during 1912 and 1913 is of importance to every exhibitor. A folder listing the various subjects that are foremost in demand has been mailed by Biograph to all exhibitors on their mailing list.

This announcement is the outcome of the large number of requests Biograph has been receiving for the re-issue of these subjects, and the course they have followed in releasing them in the regular service will enable every exhibitor to include them in his program.

It is hardly necessary to introduce these subjects to the exhibitors; suffice it to say that they are well known Biographs with the following players in the casts:— Henry Walthall, Blanche Sweet, Lillian Gish, Mae Marsh, Dorothy Gish, Robert Harron, Charles H. Mailes, W. Chrystie Miller, Lionel Barrymore, Mabel Normand, Harry Carey, Florence La Badie, Claire McDowell, Charles H. West, etc., etc., and directed by D. W. Griffith, who directed "Judith of Bethulia" and "The Birth of a Nation," the two greatest motion pictures ever produced.

These re-issues will be released in the regular service every Friday, beginning with "The Battle" on Friday, June 11, and, judging by the interest being taken in them, the demand for bookings should be large.

"The Middleman"

A Cosmofotofilm Production Starring Albert Chevalier in a Filmed Version of Henry Arthur Jones' Play.

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

ALBERT CHEVALIER is a very pleasant memory in the minds of the older generation of American theater-goers. In his own particular field, i.e., the portrayal of the British proletariat, Chevalier has never had a rival. In this play he not only shows that his great histrionic powers are still in their prime but he demonstrates an extraordinary power of emotion of which the old Coster parts had given but little indication. The film debut of Mr. Chevalier has in all respects been a most gratifying success.

"The Middleman" is of the type of melodrama which bids fair to remain popular for many a generation to come. It is tinged with the sentiment which inspired such plays as "Jane Eyre" and "East Lynne" in England and "Silver King" and "The Old Homestead" on our side of the water. In other words it is sound morally and strong dramatically, a combination which can never fail in its appeal to English and American audiences. It is miles removed from the "problem play," no subtle psychological discoveries are attempted; he who runs may read and he who sees is bound to be moved. I think it is just to say that most of the absurdities of the melodrama have been carefully avoided. Impressive and delightful bits of symbolism have been invented to take the place of the hoary props, such as "the snow storm" and "the sleigh bells." I refer to the scenes showing the crushing of the lilies and the superb flash of allegory contrasting capital and labor.

The significance of the title is not quite apparent to the average American audience; the vocabulary from which it has been borrowed is narrowly English. In theory it may seem somewhat absurd to speak of fine characterization in an avowed old-fashioned melodrama but in fact it is entirely true that Mr. Chevalier had excellent support, all of which excelled in characterization. The mixing of a somewhat rough humor with the heavy drama is no doubt one of the elements of strength in the play. Adaptation, direction, settings and photography are of the highest order. Plays of the type of "The Middleman" will make friends for the screen and win patrons for the exhibitor. I wish we had more of them even if they are conventional and stereotyped in the minor parts.

Motor Car Comedy With King Baggot.

Occasionally, as a relief from the hard strain of playing a heavy dramatic part in a big production, King Baggot loves to plunge into a one reel comedy and enjoy himself with the enthusiasm of a boy in swimming. He gets as much fun out of it as the audiences do, and that is saying something. Now he is doing a one reel Universal Imp comedy which will be known as "His First Automobile" and in it he does some crazy stunts as a chauffeur, showing that he is really an expert in driving a motor car.

He plays the part of a young business man on a small salary who would dearly love to own an automobile. He finally saves enough to buy himself a little undersized, one cylinder insert, commonly known as a "road louse" but sometimes dignified as a "run-about." He takes his girl out joy riding and they have a lot of funny experiences. Baggot shows in these road scenes a remarkable control over an automobile, and the stunts he does with the little car and the big touring car show that he is a real expert. They have some very narrow escapes from danger, and some of them are quite as dangerous as they look. In one part of the picture Baggot dreams that the little runabout is a big touring car. And he puts this big machine through some fancy evolutions that would tax the skill of some of our best little chauffeurs.

"In Her Daddy's Footsteps"

Two-Reel Grandin Comedy of Exceptional Quality Appearing on the Program of the United Film Service.

IT is a pleasure in this day of slapstick comedies to review once in a while a comedy that is based on a legitimate situation. "In Her Daddy's Foosteps" happens to be one of this sort, and has been played and directed with more than the ordinary amount of tact. efforts in investigation when daddy, who has promised to take daughter out for a good time, suddenly retracts his promise on the strength of a note which he receives, at the same time pleading a business engagement. The note carelessly left on the table and picked up by daughter, is found to contain an invitation to come and share in a "big time," and on the investigation of what is to constitute daddy's good time is based the comedy of the play. It turns out, after the pretty minx has dressed in her brother's clothes and followed in daddy's footsteps that the "good time" takes place in a gambling den; and before the close of an eventful evening, which includes a raid on the gambling house, she lives to rue her interference in daddy's business, for all are sentenced to ten days in jail.

As before said, the comedy is an exceedingly good one, and will be warmly welcomed by any audience. It is clean comedy, it has been smoothly developed, and well photographed, and is altogether an unusually enjoyable number.

A Distinguished Motion Picture Group.

A recent group photograph taken at the World Film studio includes a number of artists and directors probably without equal in respect of ability and money earning power in any other motion picture producing company in the world.

A Distinguished Motion Picture Group.

Reading from left to right in the picture we see, in the top row, Mons. A. Capellani, who made the famous twelve reel picture "Les Miserables;" next to him is Frank Crane. Then comes Mons. Chautard, who is making "The Boss," in which his immediate neighbor, the famous actor Holbrook Blinn, is starring. Immediately behind Mr. Blinn is Maurice Tourneur, the celebrated director. The smiling face of Alice Brady, the clever daughter of William A. Brady is evident. On her left stands James ("Jimmy") Young, now directing "Little Miss Brown;" at the extreme left of the picture is the obviously beautiful Clara Kimball Young, one of the most gifted actresses now appearing in motion pictures. In the front row sits the famous Wilton Lackaye, with, on his right, Elaine Hammerstein, granddaughter of the world renowned Oscar; on Mr. Lackaye's left is Miss Dorothy Gibson.

"Prohibition" Territory Going Fast.

If present indications count for anything, before another month has passed all available territorial rights on "Prohibition," the big "anti-booze" melodrama, will have been disposed of. Robert T. Kane, president of the Prohibition Film Corp., owners of the feature, says that he has already received offers for every state in the United States as well as for a number of the foreign countries. Almost without exception, Mr. Kane says, the offers have been attractive ones, but the actual closing of contracts on a great deal of the territory has been held up until such time as other offers already tentatively made can be officially recorded.

No less than six offers from as many different people have been made for the world rights on the picture, but all of these propositions have been refused because of the company's conviction that the best interests of the moving picture industry, as well as their own best interests, are to be served by the disposal of the rights on the picture in the usual way. One offer for the world promotion of the picture came from newspaper interests in the United States which represent one of the biggest combinations of capital in the country.

The Prohibition company have "gone the limit" in the handling of the big feature which has aroused so much interest, both because of its inherent strength as a story and because of its timeliness. Nine styles of posters, all in seven colors, including a twenty-sheet which is an exceptional "flash," have been provided. In addition there are heralds, slides, photographs, a press book and press sheets for use in lobby frames.

Lionel Barrymore Signs With Pathe.

Pathe has added to the fine cast of the new "Exploits of Elaine" Lionel Barrymore, celebrated brother of the famous John and Ethel Barrymore, and nephew of John Drew. Seldom in pictures has such an aggregation of real stars been identified with one production as in "Elaine"—Arnold Daly, Edwin Arden, Pearl White and Lionel Barrymore.

This is not Mr. Barrymore's first appearance on the screen—he has had important parts in several big productions, but it is with the legitimate stage that his name has been most associated. He was broken into the profession by his uncle, John Drew, with whom he played for a number of years. Mr. Barrymore owns a fine summer home at Rocky Point, Long Island, but says that he has been trying in vain for four years to get acquainted with it. No sooner does he start to leave town than he is offered a fat engagement which no sane man could refuse.

The Whartons expect to move the "Exploits of Elaine" Company to Ithaca in a week or two, and take the future installments on their fine new property there. This is what reconciles Mr. Barrymore to another summer spent away from Rocky Point.

"Princess Romanoff."

A Five-Part Fox Offering Featuring Nance O'Neil—Melodrama with Cheap Story, Elaborately Costumed, and Well Acted.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

THERE is no doubt as to the kind of audience this picture, "The Princess Romanoff," is aimed at—it's the cheap kind. The story would hardly interest an intelligent spectator; but it shows at some length the things that will pass for high life in the kitchens of the middle class. The leading lady, Nance O'Neil is certainly able to act and she has plenty of chance to do all kinds of acting; but who could make us believe the emotions of this developing situation taken from Victorian Sardou's "Fedora." In part, she is well supported; but there is much in the general conduct of the offering that hints at poor direction—the servants are awkward; the bad manners of the aristocrat here are not convincing. He is not the kind of man who would have been able to fool the Princess; not as shown here. Many of the sets are very effective; but the director has overworked the high-lifted camera into a mannerism.

Distinguished Visitors at Centaur Plant.

Society was represented in numbers at the plant of the Centaur Film Company in Bayonne, N. J., quite recently. As the guests of M. W. H. Natter, assistant treasurer of the Centaur Company, a party including Miss Janet Fish, Mrs. Stuyvesant Fish, Mrs. Redmond, Mrs. Burke Roche, Mrs. J. Lowell Putnam and Miss Lota Robinson was given a peek into the inner workings of a big modern film plant, where everything that is necessary to the production of motion pictures, except raw stock, is manufactured. Before leaving the plant the party posed for a few feet of pictures, of which each guest will be presented with a copy when finished.

The grim tragedy resultant from leading a butterfly life is strongly brought out in this modern problem play, in two acts. While the husband is bending every effort to win success in the literary world, the wife is frittering away her time on social gayeties, caring nothing for his calling and having but little sympathy with his ambitions. He, on the other hand, cares nothing for society and leaves his wife too much alone. The result is the obvious. Gay and pretty, she is courted by a scapegrace millionaire and finally elopes with him. The husband goes into the country for a rest and falls in love with a country lass and she with him. He does not tell her, however, being bound by marriage ties, although his wife is faithless. In the meantime the millionaire tires of the wife and abandons her. He meets the same country lass and makes love to her. Then the broken woman decides to save the girl from her own fate and tells her all. Later she goes to the millionaire's yacht, where she surprises him and kills him and herself. The husband, freed, then seeks his sweetheart in the country. Richard C. Travers, as the husband; Ruth Stonehouse, as the country girl; Mame Gehrue, as the wife, and Sydney Ainsworth, as the tempter, make a strong cast. Released May 25.

"THEIR ONE LOVE" FEATURES THANHOUSER'S TWINS.

Madeline and Marion Fairbanks, the Thanhouser twins, are to the fore again in "Their One Love," a Thanhouser release in the Mutual program. In this play the two girls have cared for Jack since childhood and he appears to care equally for them, although he shows no special preference and seems to delight in the society of both. When the Civil War came, and Jack enlisted, he is shown taking an affectionate farewell of both girls. Each of them loves him, but each guards her secret jealously.

They dream, each of them, that he will return and claim her for his bride. Soon they discover each other's secret. Both write letters to Jack saying to take care of himself for the sake of the other sister who loves him. Jack gets neither of these letters for he has been killed, and the sisters grow old together, never marrying, but always cherishing their ideal.

"THE LURE" REPEATS TO BIG BUSINESS.

One of the best proofs of the contention that second run is more profitable than first run are the results obtained on the booking of "The Lure" second run to the Colonial Theater, Seattle. The Colonial is one of the big theaters of the city but like all the other houses there, has felt extreme competition within the past year and a half. Three new theaters have been erected in Seattle each seating from 2,500 to 3,000, forming just that much additional competition. "The Lure" originally ran in Seattle for four days. The Colonial brought it back for four more days in February. Geo. P. Endert, Seattle Manager of the World Film Corporation, made this four days booking on the understanding that a certain amount of advertising would be done and that amount was more than the rental of the feature. A page ad was run in the leading Seattle paper. 30-24 sheets stands were posted. A great number of 6 sheets and 3 sheets were also used. Various other advertising methods were employed. As a result the theater packed them in every day that "The Lure" was shown.

LUBIN MAKING "THE GREAT RUBY."

The Lubin Company began the filming this week of the famous Drury Lane melodrama "The Great Ruby" originally produced in this country by Augustin Daly and a cast which included Ada Rehan, Blanche Bates, Charles Richmond and other well known players. "The Great Ruby" was written by Cecil Raleigh and Henry Hamilton. The film version was made by Clay M. Greene and the production is being directed by Barry O'Neil. "The Great Ruby" is especially suitable for screen production because of its sensationalism, the intensity of the story itself and the wide latitude permitted the director. Money will not be spared, according to Ira M. Lowry, general manager of the Lubin Company, in making this production one of the most noteworthy features of the year. It will be released under the direction of the V-L-S-E.

The cast includes Beatrice Morgan, for many years one of Charles Frohman's stars, who will play Lady Garnett; Josephine Parks, George Soule Spencer, Eleanor Barry, Frankie Mann, Walter Hitchcock, Mildred Gregory, Ruth Bryan, Peter Lang, Ferdinand Tidmarsh, Charles Brandt, Douglas Sibole, William Turner, George Trimble, Clarence Elmer, James Cassady, Percy Winter and Walter Law.
